New Mexico: Congressman Ben Ray Luján: 134,000 New Mexicans with Student Loans Would Benefit from Bill to Allow Refinancing

LENGTH: 452 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Democratic Party has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District highlighted the impact of legislation that would allow New Mexican's with student loan debt to refinance their loans to take advantage of low interest rates. Luján is a cosponsor of the Bank on Students Emergency Loan Refinancing Act, which according to the Department of Education, would help 134,000 New Mexicans with student loan debt.

"Whether it's buying that first home, raising a child, or saving for a dignified retirement, student loan debt is making it difficult for hard-working New Mexico families to get ahead," Congressman Luján said. "During this period of historically low interest rates, consumers have had the opportunity to refinance loans on homes, cars and more, locking in rates that will save them money in the years to come. Unfortunately, student loan borrowers have been left out, unable to refinance their loans and cut their bills. This legislation takes a commonsense step to help address the growing burden of student loan debt faced by so many New Mexicans."

The Bank on Students Emergency Loan Refinancing Act enables student loan borrowers, including those with graduate and parent loans, to refinance their loans at a lower interest rate, providing an opportunity for borrowers to reduce their payments and put thousands of dollars back in their pockets. According to the Department of Education, borrowers in the U.S. are carrying $1.3 trillion in student loan debt, including $6.1 billion from borrowers in New Mexico. The national average debt load for a bachelor's degree recipient is approximately $30,000. Refinancing loans at today's lower interest rates would save families an estimated $50 billion nationwide, which they could reinvest in their local economy.

This legislation stands in stark contrast to the Republican budget recently passed by the House, which will make college more expensive by cutting Pell Grants by $90 billion and freezing funding for 10 years. It also eliminates a provision that prevents low-income students with need-based loans from accruing interest while they are still in school, adding $34.8 billion to the indebtedness of America's students.

"A college education is one of the most valuable investments a family can make, but the irresponsible Republican budget leaves everyday New Mexicans behind and makes a quality education more expensive," added Luján. "Instead, Congress should stand with New Mexico families by giving relief to student loan borrowers that will also provide a boost to our economy."

New Mexico: Congressman Ben Ray Luján Announces $4.2 Million for Health Clinics in Northern New Mexico

LENGTH: 238 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Democratic Party has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District announced yesterday that El Centro Family Health has received a nearly $4.2 million grant to support its efforts to provide health care to rural communities across Northern New Mexico. The grant through the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services will help El Centro Family Health reach families at its 13 medical clinics, 11 school-based clinics, and three dental clinics.

"Community health centers provide vital health services in many rural communities throughout Northern New Mexico, ensuring that our families, friends and neighbors have access to quality, affordable care," Congressman Luján said. "This important federal grant will enhance El Centro Family Health's efforts to support the health and well-being of all those in New Mexico who rely on its vital services."

The grant of $4,188,292 will assist the network of clinics that spans 22,000 square miles and serves more than 18,800 patients a year. Congressman Luján has been a strong supporter of community health centers, voting recently for legislation to fund the Community Health Center Fund through 2017 and sending a letter to the leadership of the House Appropriations Committee calling for robust funding for health centers.

New Mexico: Congressional Delegation Meets with HHS Secretary to Discuss NM Behavioral Health Disruptions

LENGTH: 648 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Democratic Party has issued the following news release:

Yesterday, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, and U.S. Representatives Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham with U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Sylvia Burwell to discuss their concerns about the continuing disruptions of behavioral health services in New Mexico.

In 2013, the New Mexico Human Services Department suspended Medicaid payments to 15 nonprofit behavioral health providers claiming "credible allegations of fraud." This led to the closure and eventual replacement of 12 behavioral health providers with Arizona-based providers. Two of these replacement providers are now pulling out of the state, leaving gaps in access for critical behavioral health services under Medicaid for many New Mexicans with serious mental illness and substance abuse disorders. Udall, Heinrich, Luján and Lujan Grisham have previously pressed Burwell to increase oversight to assure transparency and predictability for quality services, particularly for vulnerable Medicaid participants.

"New Mexico's behavioral health services are in crisis, devastating patients across the state, including many children," Udall said. "While Medicaid is a state program and it will take strong state leadership to get these services back on track, I'm glad Secretary Burwell committed to using every tool in her toolbox to help New Mexico restore our behavioral health system. Thousands of New Mexicans depend on these services, including some with serious mental illness and substance abuse disorders. This disruption threatens their livelihoods and families, and we need a long-term, transparent solution."

"Much of New Mexico's behavioral health system was turned upside down overnight when the state suspended Medicaid payments to providers," Heinrich said. "Our meeting with Secretary Burwell was productive and an important opportunity to reiterate our concerns about problems with continuity of care and continued service disruptions. Moving forward, the Department of Health and Human Services has committed to supporting efforts to rebuild the state's behavioral health safety net and to ensuring that those in need get the quality care they deserve."

"Our meeting was an important opportunity to make clear to Secretary Burwell that New Mexicans continue to be impacted by the upheaval in the state's behavioral health system," Luján said. "The voices of constituents in our communities tell a story of patients slipping through the cracks and unacceptable disruptions and gaps in care, while providers are pulling out of New Mexico. From the beginning, the process of replacing New Mexico providers was not transparent and entities that were brought in have now left, leaving New Mexicans without service. This process is clearly flawed and needs to be fixed. I am encouraged by our conversation with the Secretary and hope that we can work together to ensure that some of New Mexico's most vulnerable citizens have access to the care that they desperately need."

"Members of the New Mexico delegation finally got the opportunity to share their frustration with the deterioration of New Mexico's behavioral health system with the Secretary of Health and Human Services," Lujan Grisham said. "We made it very clear to the Secretary that we have been disappointed with the lack of oversight by an agency that has a responsibility to ensure credible access to services through a federal health program. We also made it clear that we expect the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services to take a more active role in working with providers and holding the state accountable to get services to vulnerable New Mexicans."

LUJAN STATEMENT ON BILL ENSURING CONGRESSIONAL REVIEW OF IRAN NUCLEAR DEAL; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 143 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting in support of legislation that provides Congress with 30 days to review a final international agreement on Iran's nuclear program.

"With the House's action today, Congress will send the President a bill that he has agreed to sign, and that will ensure Congress has a role in the critical effort to prevent a nuclear armed Iran. It is vital that we use every diplomatic tool available to achieve this goal, and this bipartisan compromise will enable the Administration to continue to pursue diplomacy toward a robust agreement that puts a verifiable stop to Iran's nuclear weapons program."

LUJAN HIGHLIGHTS $6.5 MILLION USDA INVESTMENT IN OGALLALA AQUIFER REGION;
Funding to Support Water Conservation in Eastern New Mexico; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 279 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted today a $6.5 million investment by the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) in the Ogallala Aquifer region to support water conservation and improve water quality. As part of the effort, USDA has identified seven priority areas, including Eastern New Mexico.

"These federal funds come at an important time as Eastern New Mexico is feeling the impact of severe drought conditions over the past few years," Congressman Lujan said. "Investing in projects to promote water conservation will ensure that we are making the most of our scarce water resources and stretch them farther to support communities in Eastern New Mexico."

Through the Ogallala Aquifer Initiative, the Natural Resources Conservation Service (NRCS) will work with producers in Eastern New Mexico to convert irrigated cropland to dryland cropping systems and restore grasslands. NRCS will also work with producers to reduce pumping on 1,190 acres a year for four years, conserving 1.56 billion gallons of water during that time - water that will be used for agriculture lands, cities like Clovis and Portales, and Cannon Air Force Base.

The Ogallala Aquifer supports nearly one-fifth of the wheat, corn, cotton, and cattle produced in the United States and is the main water supply for the High Plains population. The reservoir covers about 174,000 square miles mainly in Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas, while also covering part of New Mexico, South Dakota, Wyoming, and Colorado.

NM senators miss chance to tilt trade toward U.S.

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. A8

LENGTH: 538 words

If you make items out of iron or steel in New Mexico and try to sell them to folks in Vietnam, you face a 15 percent tariff. Plastics and auto parts get at least a 20 percent tariff in Malaysia, and cheese products are assessed almost 30 percent in Japan. In addition to that cost, which you likely tack on to your product, you face mandatory trips to these Trans-Pacific Partnership countries, long delays in customs and mountains of paperwork to get your product to those markets.

And yet, all of these items are in the state's top 20 list of exports, according to the U.S. Census. All are part of the reason New Mexico is No. 1 in export-related job growth - 16,500 total jobs last year. In fact, one out of every two New Mexico exports goes to a TPP country, according to the U.S. Trade Representative Office.

Imagine what the export totals could be if the tariffs and red tape were cut.

So why would the Democrats in the state's congressional delegation be so vehemently opposed to leveling the playing field for their constituents?

To hear them, it has to do with not "see(ing) the details of the TPP" (Sen. Martin Heinrich). With "limit(ing) the Senate's ability to review trade agreements and represent our constituents' interests." (Sen. Tom Udall). With "limit(ing) Congress' ability to ensure that any trade agreement addresses critical concerns that impact hard-working families in New Mexico" (Rep. Ben Ray Luján). And with "cutt(ing) Congress out of the details, mak(ing) it impossible to know whether there are adequate worker protections in a prospective trade deal." (Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham).

Yet detailed summaries of the White House's negotiating priorities for TPP are on the U.S. Trade Representative website, the full negotiating texts are available for congressional review, and to date there have been no fewer than 1,700 congressional briefings on TPP, according to the administration.

The TPP is a proposed trade agreement involving 12 countries throughout the Asia-Pacific region, including Latin America and Mexico. Why any deal with that many moving parts should be subjected to the machinations of 100 senators and 435 representatives - no matter how well-intentioned - defies logic. Thomas J. Donohue, president and CEO of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, says as much, explaining that the potential for that much tinkering would make the country's allies say "forget it" rather than go through lengthy, delicate negotiations that could be summarily revised.

The fast-track mechanism, aka Trade Promotion Authority, would simply remove the potential for interminable revisions but still give the Senate and House final say on any agreement with up or down votes. On Tuesday the Senate voted 52-45 against it. And that sends a signal to countries including China to step in, fill the void and set the rules.

New Mexico's senators missed an opportunity Tuesday to tilt things in the favor of New Mexico and the nation. Constituents can only hope the opportunity presents itself again, because isolationism doesn't work. As the Trade Representative Office says, "the question isn't should we trade; it's how. ... There is a cost to doing nothing."

And New Mexicans and Americans shouldn't have to pay that price.

Behavioral health woes targeted; Federal, local officials work to rebuild treatment program

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 690 words

DATELINE: GALLUP

GALLUP -- New Mexico's congressional delegates are dedicated to addressing the disruptions of behavioral health services in the state caused by allegations of fraud, according to a news release, but they also have Gallup's unique problems in mind.

U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham, and a representative for Rep. Steve Pearce met with U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Sylvia Burwell April 30 to discuss behavioral health issues in New Mexico, according to a news release.

Although Gallup didn't come up in that discussion with Burwell, Luján's office is aware of the issues surrounding Gallup Detox Center, which replaced the treatment facility Na'nizhoozhi Center Inc.

"The Gallup Detox Center was created and sustained through congressional earmarks, which have since been banned by Republicans in Congress," Lujan's Communications Director Andrew Stoddard said. "Because that is no longer a possible source of funding, the office would like to work with Indian Health Services, Health and Human Services, the city of Gallup, and the Navajo Nation to discuss other options to support the detox center and find a path forward."

Local officials -- including Mayor Jackie McKinney and Navajo Nation Behavioral Health Services administrator Theresa Galvan -- have admitted that Gallup Detox does not provide adequate treatment, but they've been seeking new funding sources and working on rebuilding the treatment program.

Payments suspended

In 2013, the New Mexico Human Services Department suspended Medicaid payments to 15 nonprofit behavioral health providers claiming "credible allegations of fraud," according to a news release. This led to the closure and eventual replacement of 12 behavioral health providers with Arizona-based providers.

Two of those replacement providers are now pulling out of the state, leaving gaps in access for behavioral health services under Medicaid for many New Mexicans with mental illness and substance abuse disorders.

Udall, Heinrich, Luján and Lujan Grisham have previously pressed Burwell to increase oversight to assure transparency and predictability for quality services, particularly for vulnerable Medicaid participants.

"New Mexico's behavioral health services are in crisis, devastating patients across the state, including many children," Udall said.

He said it will take strong state leadership to get services back on track, and he's glad that Burwell has committed to helping the state. He stressed that thousands of New Mexicans depend on behavioral health services.

"This disruption threatens their livelihoods and families, and we need a long-term, transparent solution," he said.

Heinrich said the behavioral health system was turned upside down overnight, but he felt the meeting with Burwell was productive and an important opportunity to re-emphasize state concerns.

"Moving forward, the Department of Health and Human Services has committed to supporting efforts to rebuild the state's behavioral health safety net and to ensuring that those in need get the quality care they deserve," Heinrich said.

Lujan Grisham said the meeting was also a chance to finally share their frustration.

"We made it very clear to the Secretary that we have been disappointed with the lack of oversight by an agency that has a responsibility to ensure credible access to services through a federal health program," she said. "We also made it clear that we expect the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services to take a more active role in working with providers and holding the state accountable to get services to vulnerable New Mexicans."

Slipping through the cracks

Luján said patients are slipping through the cracks as a result of the disruptions and gaps in services.

"From the beginning, the process of replacing New Mexico providers was not transparent and entities that were brought in have now left, leaving New Mexicans without service," he said. "This process is clearly flawed and needs to be fixed."

However, he feels encouraged after the conversation with Burwell and he hopes they can all work together to correct the situation.

Udall, Heinrich, Luján and Pearce Introduce Bipartisan Bill to Promote Preservation of Native American Languages

LENGTH: 791 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Martin Heinrich, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representatives Ben Ray Luján and Steve Pearce announced they have introduced the Esther Martinez Native American Languages Preservation Act, a bill to provide grants to Native American language educational organizations to preserve disappearing Native languages in Indian Country. The bill reauthorizes the Native American Languages Program until 2020, and includes improvements to expand the program's eligibility to smaller-sized classes and allow for longer grant periods.

The bill reauthorizes legislation that first passed in 2006 with Udall's leadership, named for the Ohkay Owingeh Pueblo master storyteller Esther Martinez. The Esther Martinez Native American Preservation Act amends the Native American Languages Act of 1990 to strengthen Native language education by creating and funding Native language nests, Native language survival schools, and Native American language restoration programs. The program's current authorization expired in 2012, but annual appropriations have continued during the lapse.

"Esther Martinez was one of New Mexico's strongest advocates for preserving Native heritage and language, and I'm proud to introduce this legislation to honor and continue her work. Grants through the Esther Martinez Native American Languages Preservation Act help families and communities keep their languages alive, preserving the deep history and culture behind them," Udall said. "Language education is about more than tradition; it fosters pride and an interconnectedness between generations and has been linked to higher academic achievement among Native youth. I'm proud to support the continuation and expansion of these important grants in New Mexico and across the country."

"Preserving Native language is central to cultural identity, and that's what Esther Martinez fought for. Languages like Keres, Tewa, Tiwa, Towa, Zuni, Diné, Eastern Apache and Western Apache, make us a stronger, more culturally rich and historically grounded nation," Heinrich said. "Simultaneously, the preservation and instruction of these languages raises high school graduation rates and college enrollment for tribal students. Teaching and preserving these languages should be a central educational priority. This bill helps to achieve that goal."

"Preserving language is essential to ensuring the preservation of the rich history and culture of tribal communities in New Mexico and across the country," Luján said. "Without urgent and sustained intervention many Native languages risk extinction in the coming decades. This legislation will support language immersion programs that expand fluency in Native languages and strengthen valuable connections between Native students and their culture and communities. It will help carry on the proud traditions that Esther Martinez worked so hard to protect and pass down from generation to generation."

"The preservation of Native American languages is essential in retaining the rich culture and history of the various tribes in New Mexico," said Pearce. "The grant money provided through the Esther Martinez Native American Languages Preservation Act is critical to accomplishing this goal. I am proud to support the reauthorization of this program as it will allow Native languages in New Mexico and across the country to be passed on to future generations.

Based on recommendations from tribes and the administration, the New Mexico members included improvements to the program in this bill to reduce the class size eligibility for the grants and allow longer grant periods of up to five years. The bill reduces the number of students required for eligibility from 10 to five for Native American language nests, which provide childcare and instruction for children up to age seven and their parents. The bill also reduces the class size required for eligibility from 15 to 10 students for Native language survival schools, which aim for their students to achieve Native language fluency, and provide teacher training and development to support successful language learning. The urgent need to protect and preserve Native American languages is clear and applications for grants through the program roughly doubled from fiscal year 2013 to 2014, according to the Department of Health and Human Services.

This bill is cosponsored by U.S. Sens. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), Heidi Heitkamp (D-N.D.), Jon Tester (D-Mont.), Al Franken (D-Minn.), and Brian Schatz (D-Hawaii) and has the bipartisan support of eight cosponsors in House.

NM Behavioral Health Shakeup Goes Federal

BYLINE: Horwath, Justin

SECTION: SFR BRIEFS; Pg. 11 Vol. 42 No. 18 ISSN: 0744-477X

LENGTH: 439 words

ABSTRACT

"New Mexico's behavioral health services are in crisis, devastating patients across the state, including many children," Sen. Tom Udall said in a prepared statement. "While Medicaid is a state program, and it will take strong state leadership to get these services back on track, I'm glad Secretary [Sylvia Burwell] committed to using every tool in her toolbox to help New Mexico restore our behavioral health system. Thousands of New Mexicans depend on these services, including some with serious mental illness and substance abuse disorders. This disruption threatens their livelihoods and families, and we need a long-term, transparent solution."

FULL TEXT

Members or representatives of the state's entire congressional delegation say they met on April 30 with US Health and Human Services Department Secretary Sylvia Burwell to express concerns about a service shakeup here.

"New Mexico's behavioral health services are in crisis, devastating patients across the state, including many children," Sen. Tom Udall said in a prepared statement. "While Medicaid is a state program, and it will take strong state leadership to get these services back on track, I'm glad Secretary Burwell committed to using every tool in her toolbox to help New Mexico restore our behavioral health system. Thousands of New Mexicans depend on these services, including some with serious mental illness and substance abuse disorders. This disruption threatens their livelihoods and families, and we need a long-term, transparent solution."

Sen. Martin Heinrich, Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham and Ben Ray Lujan, all Democrats along with Udall, and a staff member for Republican Rep. Steve Pearce reportedly attended the meeting.

In 2013, Republican Gov. Susana Martinez' Human Services Department froze Medicaid payments to providers accused of fraudulently receiving federal money, pending the results of criminal probes into them by the attorney general, whose office already cleared two of the providers. Other investigations remain ongoing.

State officials refute the narrative that the shakeup has resulted in disruptions in care to the vulnerable patient population. Asked to respond to the congressional Democrats' statements, HSD spokesman Matt Kennicott calls them "false."

"In fact, since changing providers, we are now serving more consumers than ever before," he says, referring to the five Arizona agencies the state shipped in to provide services in place of the accused providers. "Last year, we saw a 30.8 percent increase in the number of consumers served, and we are continuing our commitment to serve New Mexicans in need." (Justin Horwath)

Delegation Meets with HHS Secretary to Discuss NM Behavioral Health Disruptions

LENGTH: 662 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Michelle Lujan Grisham, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham, and a representative for U.S. Rep. Steve Pearce met with U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Sylvia Burwell to discuss their concerns about the continuing disruptions of behavioral health services in New Mexico.

In 2013, the New Mexico Human Services Department suspended Medicaid payments to 15 nonprofit behavioral health providers claiming "credible allegations of fraud." This led to the closure and eventual replacement of 12 behavioral health providers with Arizona-based providers. Two of these replacement providers are now pulling out of the state, leaving gaps in access for critical behavioral health services under Medicaid for many New Mexicans with serious mental illness and substance abuse disorders. Udall, Heinrich, Luján and Lujan Grisham have previously pressed Burwell to increase oversight to assure transparency and predictability for quality services, particularly for vulnerable Medicaid participants.

"New Mexico's behavioral health services are in crisis, devastating patients across the state, including many children," Udall said. "While Medicaid is a state program and it will take strong state leadership to get these services back on track, I'm glad Secretary Burwell committed to using every tool in her toolbox to help New Mexico restore our behavioral health system. Thousands of New Mexicans depend on these services, including some with serious mental illness and substance abuse disorders. This disruption threatens their livelihoods and families, and we need a long-term, transparent solution."

"Much of New Mexico's behavioral health system was turned upside down overnight when the state suspended Medicaid payments to providers," Heinrich said. "Our meeting with Secretary Burwell was productive and an important opportunity to reiterate our concerns about problems with continuity of care and continued service disruptions. Moving forward, the Department of Health and Human Services has committed to supporting efforts to rebuild the state's behavioral health safety net and to ensuring that those in need get the quality care they deserve."

"Our meeting was an important opportunity to make clear to Secretary Burwell that New Mexicans continue to be impacted by the upheaval in the state's behavioral health system," Luján said. "The voices of constituents in our communities tell a story of patients slipping through the cracks and unacceptable disruptions and gaps in care, while providers are pulling out of New Mexico. From the beginning, the process of replacing New Mexico providers was not transparent and entities that were brought in have now left, leaving New Mexicans without service. This process is clearly flawed and needs to be fixed. I am encouraged by our conversation with the Secretary and hope that we can work together to ensure that some of New Mexico's most vulnerable citizens have access to the care that they desperately need."

"Members of the New Mexico delegation finally got the opportunity to share their frustration with the deterioration of New Mexico's behavioral health system with the Secretary of Health and Human Services," Lujan Grisham said. "We made it very clear to the Secretary that we have been disappointed with the lack of oversight by an agency that has a responsibility to ensure credible access to services through a federal health program. We also made it clear that we expect the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services to take a more active role in working with providers and holding the state accountable to get services to vulnerable New Mexicans."

Lujan Announces Nearly $4.2 Million for Health Clinics in Northern New Mexico

LENGTH: 246 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District announced today that El Centro Family Health has received a nearly $4.2 million grant to support its efforts to provide health care to rural communities across Northern New Mexico. The grant through the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services will help El Centro Family Health reach families at its 13 medical clinics, 11 school-based clinics, and three dental clinics.

"Community health centers provide vital health services in many rural communities throughout Northern New Mexico, ensuring that our families, friends and neighbors have access to quality, affordable care," Congressman Luján said. "This important federal grant will enhance El Centro Family Health's efforts to support the health and well-being of all those in New Mexico who rely on its vital services."

The grant of $4,188,292 will assist the network of clinics that spans 22,000 square miles and serves more than 18,800 patients a year. Congressman Luján has been a strong supporter of community health centers, voting recently for legislation to fund the Community Health Center Fund through 2017 and sending a letter to the leadership of the House Appropriations Committee calling for robust funding for health centers.

Lujan Votes Against Republican Spending Bill that Locks in Sequester Cuts

LENGTH: 332 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District voted today against the Energy and Water Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2016 that locks in the spending cuts of the sequester that have negatively impacted New Mexico. The legislation also shortchanges investments in renewable energy that are important to New Mexico's growing clean energy sector.

"Over the past few years, New Mexico's economy has felt the impact of the sequester's arbitrary cuts. It led to cutbacks and reductions at Los Alamos National Lab that weakened our economy and took a toll on New Mexico families," Congressman Luján said. "The sequester is bad for New Mexico and we must eliminate it. However, today's spending bill locks in the sequester, paving the way for future spending cuts at New Mexico's national labs. In addition, it includes a cut for environmental cleanup at a time when this must remain a top priority. Funding scientific research and development at the labs is critical to our nation's economic competitiveness and I will continue to fight for the investments we need to ensure our labs remain on the cutting edge."

The Republican spending bill includes $1.1 billion in cuts below the President's request for renewable energy and energy efficiency as well an $82 million cut to efforts to modernize the nation's electricity grid.

"New Mexico's renewable energy sector has the potential to grow our economy and create good jobs in our community that can't be shipped overseas," Luján added. "We have seen important growth in solar and wind energy across New Mexico, and it is vital that we continue to support efforts to strengthen this industry that is good for our economy. Unfortunately, this spending bill takes New Mexico and our nation in the wrong direction."

Lujan and VFW Agree: VA Spending Bill a Bad Bill for Veterans

LENGTH: 233 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District voted against the Military Construction, Veterans Affairs and Related Agencies appropriations bill today over serious concerns that the funding bill is inadequate to meet the needs of New Mexico's veterans. The legislation is opposed by Veterans Service Organizations, including the Disabled American Veterans, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and American Legion, and includes spending reductions they have called "unconscionable."

"The VFW has called this 'a bad bill for veterans' and I agree. The Republican spending bill does not provide the necessary resources to fully address the challenges facing the VA and fails to honor the commitment made to our veterans. VA Secretary McDonald has said that cuts in this bill are the equivalent of 70,000 fewer veterans receiving VA medical care," Congressman Luján said. "Sadly, we have heard too many stories of veterans in New Mexico who have faced long delays when seeking care through the VA. Our veterans deserve better. They deserve the care and benefits they have earned due to their brave service to our nation, and this legislation fails to deliver on that promise."

Lujan Statement on Republican Budget

LENGTH: 268 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting against the Budget Committee Conference Report.

"Congressional Republicans have passed a budget that will make it tougher for hard-working Americans to get ahead. Instead of offering a blueprint will help families grow their paychecks, afford a quality college education, and save for a dignified retirement, Congressional Republicans have put special interests first.

"This irresponsible budget protects tax breaks for companies that ship jobs overseas instead of making the needed investments in education and job training so that New Mexicans can continue to gain the skills they need to compete in this global economy. It shortchanges investments in infrastructure that are critical to creating jobs and strengthening our economic competitiveness. And it continues Congressional Republicans' assault on the Affordable Care Act, threatening to take away health care coverage for millions of Americans and allowing health insurance companies to once again discriminate against 860,000 New Mexicans with pre-existing conditions.

"House Democrats have offered a budget that builds an economy that works for every day Americans. It rewards hard work, invests in the next generation, and protects our seniors to ensure a brighter future for the people of New Mexico and our nation."

Lujan Cosponsors Raise the Wage Act

LENGTH: 221 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District announced today that he is cosponsoring legislation to raise the minimum wage and put more money in the pocket of hard-working New Mexicans. The Raise the Wage Act would increase the national minimum wage from $7.25 to $12 by 2020.

"New Mexico's workers want to receive a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. They want to work hard so they can send their children to college and save for a dignified retirement," Congressman Luján said. "Yet at today's minimum wage, many full-time workers and their families have to work two or three jobs just to get by. Raising the minimum wage will reward hard work, grow opportunities, and strengthen our economy."

In addition to increasing the minimum wage, the legislation also indexes it to the median wage in 2021 in order to make sure that the minimum wage keeps pace with the growth in wages. It eliminates the tipped minimum wage gradually by raising it from $2.13 per hour to match the regular minimum wage. Setting the minimum wage at $12 in 2020 would give almost 38 million American workers a raise.

LUJAN CELEBRATES ASIAN PACIFIC AMERICAN HERITAGE MONTH;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 194 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on Asian Pacific American Heritage Month, which is celebrated in May.

"For generations, Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders have forged a proud legacy through enduring contributions to our nation. From the immigrants who came through Angel and Ellis Islands to those who continue to immigrate here today, this community has persevered in pursuit of the American Dream.

"The Asian Pacific American community is an invaluable part of the fabric of our nation, having come here to build better lives for their families, and in so doing enriching our society in every facet - as leaders, entrepreneurs, teachers, members of our armed services, and more. As the fastest growing community in America, Asian Pacific Americans will continue to play an integral role in the future of our nation. This month we proudly recognize and reflect on all that the Asian Pacific American community has contributed to the greatness of America."

NEW MEXICO DELEGATION MEETS WITH HHS SECRETARY TO DISCUSS NM BEHAVIORAL HEALTH DISRUPTIONS; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 654 words

WASHINGTON - Yesterday, U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham, and a representative for U.S. Rep. Steve Pearce met with U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Sylvia Burwell to discuss their concerns about the continuing disruptions of behavioral health services in New Mexico.

In 2013, the New Mexico Human Services Department suspended Medicaid payments to 15 nonprofit behavioral health providers claiming "credible allegations of fraud." This process is clearly flawed and needs to be fixed. I am encouraged by our conversation with the Secretary and hope that we can work together to ensure that some of New Mexico's most vulnerable citizens have access to the care that they desperately need."

"Members of the New Mexico delegation finally got the opportunity to share their frustration with the deterioration of New Mexico's behavioral health system with the Secretary of Health and Human Services," Lujan Grisham said. "We made it very clear to the Secretary that we have been disappointed with the lack of oversight by an agency that has a responsibility to ensure credible access to services through a federal health program. We also made it clear that we expect the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services to take a more active role in working with providers and holding the state accountable to get services to vulnerable New Mexicans."

LUJAN VOTES AGAINST REPUBLICAN SPENDING BILL THAT LOCKS IN SEQUESTER CUTS;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 321 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted today against the Energy and Water Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2016 that locks in the spending cuts of the sequester that have negatively impacted New Mexico. The legislation also shortchanges investments in renewable energy that are important to New Mexico's growing clean energy sector.

"Over the past few years, New Mexico's economy has felt the impact of the sequester's arbitrary cuts. It led to cutbacks and reductions at Los Alamos National Lab that weakened our economy and took a toll on New Mexico families," Congressman Lujan said. "The sequester is bad for New Mexico and we must eliminate it. However, today's spending bill locks in the sequester, paving the way for future spending cuts at New Mexico's national labs. In addition, it includes a cut for environmental cleanup at a time when this must remain a top priority. Funding scientific research and development at the labs is critical to our nation's economic competitiveness and I will continue to fight for the investments we need to ensure our labs remain on the cutting edge."

The Republican spending bill includes $1.1 billion in cuts below the President's request for renewable energy and energy efficiency as well an $82 million cut to efforts to modernize the nation's electricity grid.

"New Mexico's renewable energy sector has the potential to grow our economy and create good jobs in our community that can't be shipped overseas," Lujan added. "We have seen important growth in solar and wind energy across New Mexico, and it is vital that we continue to support efforts to strengthen this industry that is good for our economy. Unfortunately, this spending bill takes New Mexico and our nation in the wrong direction."

New Mexico: Lujan and VFW Agree: VA Spending Bill a Bad Bill for Veterans

LENGTH: 242 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District voted against the Military Construction, Veterans Affairs and Related Agencies appropriations bill today over serious concerns that the funding bill is inadequate to meet the needs of New Mexico's veterans. The legislation is opposed by Veterans Service Organizations, including the Disabled American Veterans, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and American Legion, and includes spending reductions they have called "unconscionable."

"The VFW has called this 'a bad bill for veterans' and I agree. The Republican spending bill does not provide the necessary resources to fully address the challenges facing the VA and fails to honor the commitment made to our veterans. VA Secretary McDonald has said that cuts in this bill are the equivalent of 70,000 fewer veterans receiving VA medical care," Congressman Luján said. "Sadly, we have heard too many stories of veterans in New Mexico who have faced long delays when seeking care through the VA. Our veterans deserve better. They deserve the care and benefits they have earned due to their brave service to our nation, and this legislation fails to deliver on that promise."

This legislation funds the VA at $1.2 billion below the President's request.

New Mexico: Lujan Statement on Republican Budget

LENGTH: 264 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting against the Budget Committee Conference Report.

"Congressional Republicans have passed a budget that will make it tougher for hard-working Americans to get ahead. Instead of offering a blueprint will help families grow their paychecks, afford a quality college education, and save for a dignified retirement, Congressional Republicans have put special interests first.

"This irresponsible budget protects tax breaks for companies that ship jobs overseas instead of making the needed investments in education and job training so that New Mexicans can continue to gain the skills they need to compete in this global economy. It shortchanges investments in infrastructure that are critical to creating jobs and strengthening our economic competitiveness. And it continues Congressional Republicans' assault on the Affordable Care Act, threatening to take away health care coverage for millions of Americans and allowing health insurance companies to once again discriminate against 860,000 New Mexicans with pre-existing conditions.

"House Democrats have offered a budget that builds an economy that works for every day Americans. It rewards hard work, invests in the next generation, and protects our seniors to ensure a brighter future for the people of New Mexico and our nation."

LUJAN COSPONSORS RAISE THE WAGE ACT; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 204 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District announced today that he is cosponsoring legislation to raise the minimum wage and put more money in the pocket of hard-working New Mexicans. The Raise the Wage Act would increase the national minimum wage from $7.25 to $12 by 2020.

"New Mexico's workers want to receive a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. They want to work hard so they can send their children to college and save for a dignified retirement," Congressman Lujan said. "Yet at today's minimum wage, many full-time workers and their families have to work two or three jobs just to get by. Raising the minimum wage will reward hard work, grow opportunities, and strengthen our economy."

In addition to increasing the minimum wage, the legislation also indexes it to the median wage in 2021 in order to make sure that the minimum wage keeps pace with the growth in wages. It eliminates the tipped minimum wage gradually by raising it from $2.13 per hour to match the regular minimum wage. Setting the minimum wage at $12 in 2020 would give almost 38 million American workers a raise.

Quick fix elusive for road troubles; County, federal officials to hold joint meeting

BYLINE: Dan Parsons, SPECIAL TO THE INDEPENDENT

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 467 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON -- McKinley County commissioners were unable to find a quick fix to their road-access issues during a two-day trip to the nation's capital, but secured promises from federal officials that light will be shed on the problem.

"The door is no longer locked," McKinley County Attorney Doug Decker, said after the group's final meeting of the trip. "It may be stuck for while, but I feel like we are going to get in."

The commissioners' two-day trip to Washington culminated April 29 with a multi-agency meeting in Rep. Ben Ray Lujan's office. In attendance were Lujan, Bureau of Indian Affairs Director Michael Black and representatives of both the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Federal Highway Administration.

At issue is the often-cumbersome requirement that the county contact at least 50 percent of the ownership of a property before gaining legal access to repair existing damaged two-tracks. At least $5 million in state and federal money is at risk of disappearing if the county cannot bypass that requirement and break ground on certain projects, says Dimas.

Decker was pleased with the suggestion that the county could tackle projects piecemeal by working on short sections of road within single Native allotments, rather than taking on entire roads at once.

"If we can do these things piecemeal, then we can get there," Decker said. "That becomes manageable for the chapters."

Navajo Council Delegate Edmund Yazzie also attended the meeting and said he and the Nation are amenable to finding a workaround for the county to repair existing roads.

To avoid a quorum, Commissioner Genevieve Jackson was the only commission member to attend the meeting with County Manager Bill Lee, County Attorney Douglas Decker and Emergency Management Director Anthony Dimas. Commissioners Tony Tanner and Carol Bowman-Muskett remained outside while the meeting was held.

Lujan promised that he and federal-level representatives of the BIA and FEMA would travel to McKinley County within the month, if not sooner, to meet with local officials.

"We have asked for a follow-up meeting down in New Mexico within the next month," Lujan said. "The BIA and other agencies involved with this issue will provide technical support."

Lee was optimistic that the commissioners' shoe-leather lobbying had "moved the needle" toward a solution.

"We need a solution that says 'if you are using public money to improve an existing road ... that becomes an exception to the current legislation.' Congressman Lujan put the onus on the BIA to find a solution."

Jackson, who attended the meeting in person, was more cautious in her assessment of the meeting.

"This has been an issue for years," she said. "I feel like we didn't make much progress here other than to get the people out to New Mexico to see the roads."

Congressman Al Green Introduces Resolution to Promote Minority Health Awareness

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 288 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Al Green, D-Texas (9th CD), issued the following news release:

On April 30, 2015, Congressman Al Green introduced a resolution to promote minority health awareness as well as support the goals and ideals of National Minority Health Month in April 2015. The resolution specifically seeks to bring attention to the health disparities faced by minority populations in the U.S.

The resolution highlights several sobering facts about the inequality in health outcomes experienced by minorities: African-American women are twice as likely to die from cervical cancer compared to Caucasian women. According to national examination surveys, Hispanics are almost twice as likely as non-Hispanic whites to be diagnosed with diabetes by a physician.

Additionally, the Department of Health and Human Services has identified six main categories in which racial and ethnic minorities experience disparate access to health care: infant mortality, cancer screening and management, cardiovascular disease, diabetes, HIV/AIDS, and immunizations.

"All Americans regardless of race should have equal access to quality health care," Congressman Al Green said. "These troubling statistics about the state of health care and health outcomes for minority communities should be a clarion call to action for all. It is evident now more than ever, we must redouble our efforts legislatively and through community-based health care initiatives to eliminate the unhealthy circumstances that persist in our communities."

The resolution was cosponsored by Reps. G.K. Butterfield, Tony Cardenas, Judy Chu, Yvette Clarke, Robin Kelly, Barbara Lee, Michelle Lujan Grisham, and Ben Ray Lujan.

Lujan Statement on Earth Day

LENGTH: 292 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement in celebration of Earth Day.

"For 45 years, Earth Day has brought together communities and individuals from around the world to advocate for a cleaner, healthier and sustainable future. Since the first Earth Day in 1970, we have seen important progress - making our air and water cleaner, combating acid raid, and growing our use of renewable energy. We must continue to build on these successes, and to address the pressing issue of climate change that is impacting communities across New Mexico.

"This year's theme, 'It's Our Turn to Lead,' is a reminder that we all have a role to play in preserving our precious water resources, protecting our majestic lands, and using energy responsibly and efficiently. Even the small steps we can take in our own lives can have a significant impact when we work together toward a common goal.

"As we celebrate Earth Day, I have introduced legislation to support efforts to grow a clean energy economy by preparing workers for jobs in the renewable energy sector. The Community College Energy Training Act will help train students and retrain workers with the skills needed to compete in this growing field and make the next technological innovations that will further unleash the promise of a clean energy economy.

"This Earth Day, as we recognize the contributions and progress made over the past 45 years, we reaffirm our commitment to protecting and preserving our land, water, and natural resources."

County officials offer details on Washington trip

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 2

DATELINE: GALLUP

GALLUP -- McKinley County Manager Bill Lee confirmed that the Board of Commissioners will only have work sessions with congressional delegates about disaster funding, which is at risk of reverting back to the state, and will take no action during their April 27-30 trip to Washington.

During a regular commission meeting Tuesday morning, Lee provided the commissioners' itinerary as well as information about the Open Meetings Act to address concerns about the trip. The discussion was for informational purposes only. County Attorney Doug Decker was absent, but Lee read notes that Decker prepared.

"The trip to D.C. is to discuss public business; however, it is held as a work session and no action is to be taken," Lee said. "If there are actions you wish you take, we can bring those back and put them on the agenda, then take action on them."

The Washington meetings are meant to address concerns over Federal Emergency Management Agency funding and difficulties the county has experienced, Lee said.

Lee said the county was initially denied funding for the Manuelito Bridge, which was closed after it was deemed unsound in 2013. The county established a bypass road, but it gets washed out during the monsoon season every year.

The county currently has $3 million in funding that is at risk because the county is unable to settle right of way issues with the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

"I think there is more scrutiny at the state level of projects not getting completed and money not being spent down," Lee said. "It's critical that we save this money. Our legislative body worked diligently to improve our roads. All that money is in dire jeopardy of being clawed back."

In February, county officials attended the National Association of Counties Legislative Conference and talked with the state's congressional delegation about the issues the county has experienced. Lee said the delegates were interested in attacking the problem.

He said Emergency Management Director Anthony Dimas and Commissioner Genevieve Jackson went back to Washington recently to revisit the issue. Delegates expressed their interest in meeting with all of the commissioners and some department heads to have a roundtable discussion and find a resolution to protect the funding.

Jackson, Lee, Decker and Dimas along with Commissioners Carol Bowman-Muskett and Tony Tanner will fly to Washington April 27.

On April 28, they will meet with U.S. Rep. Steve Pearce at 2 p.m.; Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich at 3:30 p.m.; and Rep. Ben Ray Luján at 5 p.m. On April 29, they will meet with Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham at 10 a.m.

Also on April 29, county officials will meet with the BIA about restoring a contract with the McKinley County Adult Detention Center for housing inmates.

There is also a multi-agency meeting scheduled that day, but Lee said there's a chance that it could coincide with the BIA meeting. If that were to happen, Lee suggested that he and Jackson could break off from the rest of the group to discuss the jail contract so the rest of the county officials could attend the multi-agency meeting.

Then everybody is scheduled to fly back and drive home April 30.

Decker has previously said the trip may cost anywhere from $10,000 to $12,000. The actual expenses will be determined when they return from the trip. The commission approved unbudgeted out-of-state travel for the trip during its April 7 meeting.

Lujan Statement on Earth Day

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 278 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement in celebration of Earth Day.

"For 45 years, Earth Day has brought together communities and individuals from around the world to advocate for a cleaner, healthier and sustainable future. Since the first Earth Day in 1970, we have seen important progress - making our air and water cleaner, combating acid raid, and growing our use of renewable energy. We must continue to build on these successes, and to address the pressing issue of climate change that is impacting communities across New Mexico.

"This year's theme, 'It's Our Turn to Lead,' is a reminder that we all have a role to play in preserving our precious water resources, protecting our majestic lands, and using energy responsibly and efficiently. Even the small steps we can take in our own lives can have a significant impact when we work together toward a common goal.

"As we celebrate Earth Day, I have introduced legislation to support efforts to grow a clean energy economy by preparing workers for jobs in the renewable energy sector. The Community College Energy Training Act will help train students and retrain workers with the skills needed to compete in this growing field and make the next technological innovations that will further unleash the promise of a clean energy economy.

"This Earth Day, as we recognize the contributions and progress made over the past 45 years, we reaffirm our commitment to protecting and preserving our land, water, and natural resources."

Serrano, Crowley, Lujan Introduce Legislation to Expand Access to STEM Fields for Hispanic Students; Rep. Jose E. Serrano (D-NY) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 558 words

Washington, D.C.--Today, Congressmen Jose E. Serrano, Joe Crowley, and Ben Ray Lujan introduced the Hispanic Opportunity Program in Education and Science Act (HOPES Act), which would require the National Science Foundation (NSF) to establish a grant program to support undergraduate science, technology, engineering, and mathematics (STEM) education at Hispanic Serving Institutions (HSIs).

In 2007, Congressman Crowley inserted language in the America COMPETES Act to allow the NSF to establish a program focused on HSIs. Despite having this authority, the NSF has yet to establish such a program. The HOPES Act will require the agency to establish a dedicated stream of funding for students attending HSIs.

"STEM education is crucial for the United States in order to maintain the lead in cutting-edge technology and competitiveness, to create well-paid jobs, and to provide opportunities for all. Unfortunately, we are not doing enough to attract Americans from all walks of life to these important and vital fields of study. The HOPES Act will increase the number of Hispanic students pursuing STEM degrees by creating dedicated funding to help students attending HSIs succeed in these fields of study. This bill will help expand opportunities for all students, and will help ensure that our workforce in the STEM fields is as diverse as our nation as a whole," said Congressman Jose E. Serrano.

"There is no question, STEM skills are critical for our country to compete in a global economy. Unfortunately, Hispanic students are severely underrepresented in these fields of tomorrow," said Congressman Joe Crowley. "Our HOPES Act builds upon efforts I have made over the past 8 years to urge the NSF to establish a separate STEM education grant for Hispanic Serving Institutions of higher education. By creating a dedicated grants program, we can help Hispanic students reach their rightful place in the STEM fields."

"The STEM fields offer a world of opportunities in growing sectors that create good jobs, and it is important that we engage students from every community. Young people need access to quality STEM education that will prepare them with the skills and knowledge they need to get ahead," said Congressman Ben Ray Lujan. "Attracting a diverse workforce will enhance our ability to out-innovate the rest of the world, and the HOPES Act will help encourage Hispanic students to engage in areas that are vital to maintaining our economic competitiveness and growing our economy."

Hispanic students are currently greatly underrepresented in the STEM fields. According to NSF data, Hispanic students comprise 10.3 percent of all students in STEM 4 year undergraduate degree programs and 14.6 percent of STEM 2 year degree programs. These numbers are well below Hispanics share of the nation's population as a whole- 17.3 percent. This legislation will increase the likelihood of Hispanic students seeking a STEM education and provide HSIs with the necessary resources in order to enhance the quality of STEM offerings at HSIs and increase retention and graduation rates of students pursuing STEM degrees. The bill is supported by the Hispanic Association of Colleges and Universities (HACU).

Key state Democratic party leaders line up behind Clinton

BYLINE: Steve Terrell, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 1341 words

April 19--Hillary Rodham Clinton officially entered the 2016 presidential race last week but she already seems to have a lock on New Mexico's Democratic Party establishment, already lining up key endorsements from key party leaders.

Indeed, many indicators look good here for Clinton in 2016. Democrats have carried the state in five of the last six presidential elections, including two wins in the 1990s by Clinton's husband, former President Bill Clinton. And, Democrats seem unified, so far at least, with no serious competition for the nomination seeming to loom on the horizon for Clinton.

But New Mexico's Republicans -- still riding high after running roughshod over Democrats last year, re-electing Gov. Susana Martinez in a landslide and capturing the state House -- aren't about to concede the state's five electoral votes.

The state GOP has promised to vigorously dish the dirt on Clinton over the next year and a half. And a leading New Mexico pollster says even though Clinton's chances in the state look very good at this early stage, if Republicans nominate a candidate who can make a strong showing with Hispanics, they could give Clinton a run for the money.

The first well-known New Mexico Democrat to hop on the Hillary train was former Albuquerque Mayor Martin Chavez, who joined the Ready for Hillary organization in 2013. In an interview Friday, Chavez said his main function was getting support from Democratic mayors and Hispanics throughout the country.

"The main function was building volunteer lists and donor lists and basic [campaign] infrastructure in the field,' he said. "Now she's got more donors and more volunteers than she did in 2008."

Chavez, who these days splits his time between Albuquerque and Washington, D.C., working as a consultant, also organized three Ready for Hillary fundraisers in New Mexico, he said.

He noted he backed Hillary Clinton for president eight years ago and Bill Clinton during his two runs for president in the '90s. "I've got Clinton tattoos all over me," Chavez joked. He said Bill Clinton also has come to New Mexico to campaign and fundraise for Chavez, who served three terms as mayor and ran for governor in 1998.

Two Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation have been backing Clinton openly for months. U.S. Sen. Martin Heinrich and U.S. Rep. Michelle Luján-Grisham of Albuquerque, co-hosted a fundraiser for Clinton in July, according to a story in Politico.

On the day after Clinton's announcement, Sen. Tom Udallposted on his political Twitter account, "I'm ready for Hillary! @HillaryClinton has the experience to be our next President. Join her team here ..." giving a link to Clinton's campaign website. Udall made a similar post on his Facebook page that day.

The other Democrat in the delegation, U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, didn't outright endorse Clinton. But through the Democratic Congressional Committee, which he heads, Luján issued a news release that said, "If chosen as our presidential nominee, Hillary Clinton will bring experience and energy to the campaign trail that will turn out hard-working families in New Mexico and across the country, and excite a new generation of Democrats."

Several prominent Democrats were listed on an invitation to a Ready for Hillary event in Albuquerque a few days before Clinton announced. Those included Luján-Grisham, former Lt. Gov. Diane Denish, former state House Speaker Kenny Martinez, several Albuquerque-area legislators, Debra Haaland, who is running for state Democratic Party Chairwoman and Santa Fe Mayor Javier Gonzales.

Gonzales, in an interview last week, said he's "100 percent" behind Clinton. "I believe in her," he said. "She will be a great president for the United States and for New Mexico." He said Clinton could be counted on to implement President Obama's plans to establish free community colleges and "closing the inequality gap" for incomes

"New Mexicans don't want their votes taken for granted," Gonzales said. "I hope she comes to Santa Fe and Northern New Mexico during the campaign.

Chavez said while he's certain Clinton will carry the state, he's worried if her lead in the polls is too wide and New Mexico isn't considered a "battleground" state, she probably wouldn't campaign here next year.

Clinton campaigned here in 2008, speaking at an Albuquerque rally right before the Democratic caucus that year, which she narrowly won. Later that year, after she'd conceded the nomination to Barack Obama, she appeared at an Española rally in support of her former rival.

Clinton also has received some high-profile support from a well-known Santa Fe couple, former Ambassador Joe Wilson and ex- CIA agent Valerie Plame. The two recently published op-eds in USA

Today and The Huffington Post praising Clinton as "by far the most qualified and trustworthy person to protect our national security interests and to create a better American future."

In an interview last week, Wilson told The New Mexican that he and his wife also backed Clinton in 2008. "The last time we spoke around the country for her," he said. And they might do the same in this election cycle. "We'll do what we can for her."

Part of Wilson and Plame's support is personal.

In 2003, Bush administration officials leaked the identity of Plame as an undercover CIA operative after Wilson criticized President George W. Bush in print for claiming that Iraq was seeking to buy nuclear material in Niger -- a claim Bush used to argue for going to war with Iraq. It was a time when "we were subjected to a vicious character assassination campaign orchestrated by senior White House officials and championed by their allies in the right-wing echo chamber ... ," the couple wrote in an op-ed.

"Both she and Bill [Clinton] reached out to us," Wilson said last week. "Bill put it in perspective, reassuring us that we had a lot of support. He said that if we left the public square, it would make it more difficult for others like us to come forward."

Of course, Democrats in the state were not the only ones who took notice of Clinton's announcement last week. On the same afternoon Clinton officially announced her candidacy, the state Republican Party emailed a news release under the subject line "Hillary Clinton Cannot Be Trusted." In it, party Chairwoman Debbie Maestas said, "American voters should be concerned with Hillary's tenure of scandal -- 20 years in the public eye running with a questionable record that has accomplished very little to move America forward, we don't want -- or need -- a leader like that."

The state GOP promised that over the next 18 months, it plans to "highlight her record of scandal and lack of accomplishments."

Albuquerque pollster Brian Sanderoff said last week that Clinton has a "very good opportunity" to carry New Mexico next year.

The state went "with gusto" for Obama in 2008 and 2012, Sanderoff said, giving him wider margins of victory than he got in other nearby states that voted for him. Despite the Republican victories last year, in national elections the state has been trending Democrat in recent years, Sanderoff said.

"But if she stumbles, if there's some big scandal, you can't discount the possibility of a Republican winning the state," Sanderoff said.

He noted George W. Bush in 2004 carried the state, winning about 40 percent of New Mexico's Hispanic vote. "Part of Bush's success here is he was from a neighboring state and he related well to Hispanics."

Though not from a neighboring state, both Jeb Bush, who speaks fluent Spanish and has a Mexican-born wife, and Sen. Marco Rubio, who is Cuban American, could do well with New Mexico Hispanics, Sanderoff said. Another GOP contender, Sen. Ted Cruz, is from the neighboring state of Texas. "But he's probably too polarizing to win here," Sanderoff said.

"It's way too early, but if you had to bet now, Hillary would be the odds-on favorite," Sanderoff said.

Rep. Lujan Honors National Service Recognition Day

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 268 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, April 17 -- Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., has issued a statement honoring volunteers doing national service for their communities in celebration of the National Service Recognition Day.

Mr. BEN RAY LUJAN of New Mexico. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor National Service Recognition Day, which was held on April, 7th. Service to our community and our country is an enduring feature of the American spirit, and today we recognize those who have made a commitment to volunteerism.

America's cities and communities are at their best when citizens are engaged and take an active role in developing solutions. The Corporation for National and Community Service operates programs that activate and empower communities to tackle some of their most pressing issues such as education, health care, national disaster recovery, and the environment.

AmeriCorps and Senior Corps operate in more than 60,000 locations across the country, bolstering both private and non-profit organizations that do vital work in their communities. These programs mobilize millions of volunteers, building skills and educating leaders nationwide. In New Mexico alone, AmeriCorps and Senior Corps involve over 5,000 individuals at more than 640 locations.

In honor of National Service Recognition Day I encourage citizens to join me in recognizing the positive impact of national service, to thank those that serve, and to find ways to become involved in their cities and communities.

LUJAN STATEMENT ON HOLOCAUST REMEMBRANCE DAY; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 150 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today in honor of Holocaust Remembrance Day.

"More than 70 years ago, millions of Jews were persecuted, imprisoned, and millions more were murdered because of their faith, heritage, and identity. To this very day, the terrible atrocities perpetrated by the Nazis shock the conscience of humanity. Today we remember all those who lost their lives and the survivors, whose stories and perseverance help provide us with the strength to combat hatred and intolerance.

"On Holocaust Remembrance Day let us recommit to standing up against anti-Semitism and all forms of bigotry. Let us not stand silent in the face of prejudice, and instead ensure we act out of respect for all people."

NM DELEGATION RESPONDS TO WIPP ACCIDENT INVESTIGATION BOARD REPORT; Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 250 words

WASHINGTON - Today, U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce and Ben Ray Lujan issued the following joint statement on the report by the U.S. Department of Energy's (DOE) Accident Investigation Board, analyzing the direct cause of the of the Feb. 14, 2014, radiological incident at the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant (WIPP):

"According to today's report, a series of critical failures of leadership at every level led to the very serious accident and release that put numerous New Mexicans at risk, shuttered WIPP for over a year, and have already cost taxpayers tens of millions of dollars.

"New Mexico is unique in the nation as the only state that houses an underground repository for transuranic waste. New Mexicans understand the incredible value of the contributions that Los Alamos National Laboratory and WIPP make to science, national security and our state's economy. But with our unique acceptance of such facilities, we also have high expectations of the Department of Energy and its contractors that they will go above and beyond to ensure our communities are not endangered. This report makes clear that the DOE and its contractors failed to keep faith with the people of New Mexico.

"We will continue doing everything we can to ensure resources are available to complete the cleanup work at Los Alamos and safely reopen WIPP."

New Mexico: LUJAN: 100 DAYS INTO CONGRESS, REPUBLICANS PUTTING SPECIAL INTERESTS AHEAD OF HARD-WORKING FAMILIES

LENGTH: 197 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today marking the 100th day of the Republican-controlled Congress that is putting the needs of special interests ahead of hard-working families. "From day one, House Republicans have pursued an agenda that looks out for the special interests instead of addressing the pressing needs of hard-working Americans in New Mexico and across the nation. They have governed from one manufactured crisis to the next, brought the Department of Homeland Security to the brink of a shutdown, and voted time and again to strip health care coverage from millions of Americans." "Democrats instead are focused on growing paychecks for hard-working Americans, rebuilding our crumbling infrastructure, and making it easier to send a kid to college. Lujan Statement on Holocaust Remembrance Day

LENGTH: 165 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today in honor of Holocaust Remembrance Day.

"More than 70 years ago, millions of Jews were persecuted, imprisoned, and millions more were murdered because of their faith, heritage, and identity. To this very day, the terrible atrocities perpetrated by the Nazis shock the conscience of humanity. Today we remember all those who lost their lives and the survivors, whose stories and perseverance help provide us with the strength to combat hatred and intolerance.

"On Holocaust Remembrance Day let us recommit to standing up against anti-Semitism and all forms of bigotry. Let us not stand silent in the face of prejudice, and instead ensure we act out of respect for all people."

Lujan: 100 Days into Congress, Republicans Putting Special Interests Ahead of Hard-Working Families

LENGTH: 200 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today marking the 100th day of the Republican-controlled Congress that is putting the needs of special interests ahead of hard-working families.

"From day one, House Republicans have pursued an agenda that looks out for the special interests instead of addressing the pressing needs of hard-working Americans in New Mexico and across the nation. They have governed from one manufactured crisis to the next, brought the Department of Homeland Security to the brink of a shutdown, and voted time and again to strip health care coverage from millions of Americans."

Lujan: Equal Pay Day Reminds Us of Importance of Paycheck Fairness Act

LENGTH: 397 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District marked Equal Pay Day today, which symbolizes when, more than three months into 2015, women's wages will finally catch up to what men earned last year. On average, women earn 78 cents for every dollar that a man earns. Luján has co-sponsored the Paycheck Fairness Act, which would provide effective solutions and protections for women who are not being paid equal wages for doing equal work.

"The pay gap between men and women doesn't just impact hard-working women - it impacts their families and their ability to put food on the table, send a child to college, or buy a home," Congressman Luján said. "At the current rate that the gap has been closing, women won't reach pay equity with men until 2058. That's why women and their families need the Paycheck Fairness Act. As long as hard-working women are making less for the same work, we must fight to pass this important legislation. Because when women succeed, America succeeds."

In New Mexico, women earn 82 cents for every dollar that a man does. While this is slightly higher than the national average, it still represents a gap of more than $7,700 every year. For Latinas and African American women, the wage gap is even worse. Latinas make 56 cents for every dollar earned by a white, non-Hispanic man and African American women make 64 cents. A study by the National Women's Law Center found that in 108 of 111 occupations analyzed, the earnings of women were less than the earnings of men.

Equal pay has been a top priority of Congressional Democrats, who passed the Paycheck Fairness Act in the House in 2008, but it was blocked by Senate Republicans. Since then, Congressional Republicans have repeatedly stood in the way of its passage. Among its many provisions, the bill requires employers to show that pay disparity is truly related to job performance, not gender; strengthens remedies for women experiencing pay discrimination; prohibits employer retaliation for sharing salary information with coworkers; and empowers women in the workplace through a grant program to strengthen salary negotiation and other workplace skills.

REP. GUTIERREZ: RUNNING OUT THE CLOCK ON IMMIGRATION LAWSUIT IS A BIG MISTAKE;
"Just like the decision not to allow a vote on immigration reform over the past two years will be seen as one of the biggest political mistakes of all time.";
Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-IL) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 1238 words

Washington, DC - Today (at approximately 10:00 a.m. ET), Rep. Luis V. Gutierrez (D-IL) spoke on the floor of the House of Representatives about the lawsuit filed to block the implementation of the President's executive actions on immigration. Standing before a picture of Judge Andrew Hanen of the Southern District of Texas, Rep. Gutierrez warned his Republican colleagues that their strategy to block the President's executive actions could have consequences in 2016.

The Congressman said: "It might turn into a drawn out series of rulings and appeals that wind up in the Supreme Court, which could take us well into 2016...an election year, where Latino U.S. citizens - not the immigrants we are discussing, but their neighbors, cousins, spouses and co-workers who are citizens - are not likely to vote for the Party that is making sure their neighbors, cousins, spouses or co-workers are still a top priority for deportation. I have a feeling the citizens will support the candidates and the parties that support their communities."

Congressman Gutierrez speaks later today at a rally and community education event in Langley Park, Maryland where he will be joined by Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer and Maryland Democrats Chris Van Hollen and Donna Edwards, among others. Flyer (English): http://1.usa.gov/1FRRev3 (Spanish): http://1.usa.gov/1cw5T2F.

On Friday (4/17), Rep. Gutierrez will be in Tucson for an immigration and executive action event with Rep. Raul Grijalva (Flyer: http://1.usa.gov/1avVwtU), followed on Saturday by an event in Albuquerque with Reps. Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham. Additional immigration and executive action events are scheduled in Washington, Oregon and Texas later in the month.

Rep. Luis V. Gutierrez represents the Fourth District of Illinois, is a Member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, is a Member of the Judiciary Committee and the Subcommittee on Immigration and Border Security, and is the Co-Chair of the Immigration Task Force of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. A video of his remarks at the Tuesday hearing of the Judiciary Committee with ICE Director Sarah Saldana is here: https://youtu.be/ZPqduWuWaDs And the "Family Defender Toolkit" he developed for those preparing for the President's immigration executive action is here: http://bit.ly/ToolKitEng and http://bit.ly/ToolkitESP.

Remarks on the House floor as prepared for delivery:

Rep. Luis V. Gutierrez

April 15, 2015

The man pictured behind me will go a long way towards determining who lives in the White House for the next few years.

No, he is not a pollster or a campaign spin-doctor.

And no, he is not a potential Republican candidate.

No, this is a federal judge for the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Texas, the honorable Judge Andrew Hanen.

The lawsuit by 26 Republican Governors and Attorneys General seeking to block the executive actions taken by the Obama Administration on immigration was filed in his court.

He has not ruled yet on the constitutionality of the case.

He ordered a preliminary injunction saying he thought the states have standing to bring the suit - or at least that the state of Texas did. And that was enough for him to stop the implementation of the plan nationwide.

And not surprisingly, just last week Judge Hanen refused the government's request to lift his injunction and allow the plan to move forward.

Here is the reality: Congress mandates that about 300,000 or 400,000 people will be deported this year out of a total of more tha 11 million undocumented.

The Secretary of Homeland Security developed a plan to choose between hardened criminals and those immigrants who have lived here at least five years, have U.S. citizen children and can pass a criminal background check at their own expense.

The plan also requires immigrants to renew their temporary status periodically to prove again that they have not committed crimes or fraudulently sought out services and benefits.

It is that plan for parents of U.S. citizens - in American families - people who have been working and staying out of trouble for years -- that the Texas Judge believes will cause irreparable damage to the State of Texas and therefore must be stopped nationally.

Just as they had hoped, Judge Hanen ruled that Texas might someday, in the future suffer irreparable harm because of driver's licenses.

In other words, people who qualify for driver's licenses, and who take the test, and pay their fees for driver's licenses -- if they live in Texas and apply for those driver's licenses in Texas -- would be doing the state irreparable damage.

I have a driver's license. It's right here. I had no idea I was causing irreparable damage to the State of Illinois just by applying for and paying for a driver's license. And learning the rules of the road, and buying car insurance, but who am I to disagree?

On Friday, the Department of Justice will argue before the 5th Circuit Court in New Orleans that the President's executive actions should move forward.

It is well-known that the 5th Circuit is among the most conservative.

But look what happened a couple of weeks ago in that very same Circuit court.

They ruled on a lawsuit related to the State of Mississippi, which, like Texas, felt it might someday in the future be dealt damage by the deferred action program announced by President Obama for DREAMers back in 2012.

The panel of judges looked at the program, the evidence, and the cost to the State of Mississippi, and the 5th Circuit judges said Mississippi is NOT harmed and thus does not have the legal standing for this lawsuit.

That bodes well for the country and the President's executive actions.

In the meantime, Judge Hanen still hasn't ruled on the case.

Maybe he is running out the clock. Trying to make immigrants in cities like Chicago and Houston lose hope or stop preparing to sign up - or maybe magically self-deport and give up on watching their children -- their U.S. citizen children - grow up.

It might turn into a drawn out series of rulings and appeals that wind up in the Supreme Court, which could take us well into 2016.

And 2016 is an election year, where Latino U.S. citizens - not the immigrants we are discussing, but their neighbors, cousins, spouses and co-workers who are citizens -- are not likely to vote for the Party that is making sure their their neighbors, cousins, spouses or co-workers are still a top priority for deportation.

I have a feeling the citizens will support the candidates and the parties that support their communities.

And I also have a feeling that the decision to drag this fight out in the courts will be one the Republican Party regrets from a political point of view.

Just like the decision not to allow a vote on immigration reform over the past two years will be seen as one of the biggest and most consequential political mistakes of all time.

How long does a vote last? 15 minutes? It might sound too much like a Geico commercial, but just 15 minutes could have saved the Republicans a great deal of heartache.

The failure to take those 15 minutes for a vote might mean that there are no Republican Presidents for a very long time who would nominate judges like this one.

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today marking the 100th day of the Republican-controlled Congress that is putting the needs of special interests ahead of hard-working families.

"From day one, House Republicans have pursued an agenda that looks out for the special interests instead of addressing the pressing needs of hard-working Americans in New Mexico and across the nation. They have governed from one manufactured crisis to the next, brought the Department of Homeland Security to the brink of a shutdown, and voted time and again to strip health care coverage from millions of Americans."

Biden not ready to decide on presidential run

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN Politics Notebook

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C1

LENGTH: 512 words

WASHINGTON - One day after Hillary Clinton's big presidential campaign announcement, Vice President Joe Biden showed up unannounced to talk tax policy at a reporters' roundtable at the White House and said he is "not ready" to make a decision about a potential White House run of his own.

"I haven't made up my mind on that," Biden said in response to a question about his political plans during a roughly 40-minute discussion of budget and tax priorities with a dozen reporters, including this one.

"I have plenty of time to do that, in my view," the vice president said. "If I am wrong, I'm dead wrong, but there's a lot the president and I care about that has to get done in the next two, three months and when you run for president you've got to run for president - and I'm not ready to do that - if I am ever going to be ready to do that. I'm not ready to do that."

Biden, 72, made no mention of Clinton's announcement, but when initially asked whether he was prepared to announce his presidential campaign, the Democratic vice president joked: "Absolutely, I'm announcing that (Sen. Marco) Rubio and I are running together."

Rubio, a Florida Republican, announced his presidential campaign Monday.

Meanwhile, three of the four Democratic members of New Mexico's congressional delegation are backing Clinton. Sen. Martin Heinrich posted his support for the former first lady and secretary of state to his Facebook page Sunday night, and Sen. Tom Udall followed with a tweet of his own on Monday.

"I'm in with @ HillaryClinton because she's the champion everyday Americans need," Heinrich posted on his personal Facebook page (as opposed to his official Senate page on the social media site). "Someone who will fight for working people and invest in clean energy."

"I'm ready for Hillary!" Udall tweeted. "Hillary Clinton has the experience to be our next President."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, the only woman in the delegation, is also throwing her endorsement to Clinton.

"Hillary Clinton's message will resonate with everyday New Mexicans who hear about the improving national economy but don't feel it at home." Lujan Grisham said. "They want a champion who will fight for families and higher wages. They want a champion who understands everyday New Mexicans should benefit from the improving economy so they can get ahead and stay ahead. I know Hillary will be that champion, and that's why I'm proud to support her."

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, is officially staying on the fence, but issued a qualified statement of support for Clinton.

"If chosen as our presidential nominee, Hillary Clinton will bring experience and energy to the campaign trail that will turn out hardworking families in New Mexico and across the country, and excite a new generation of Democrats."

For what it's worth, former Albuquerque Mayor Martin Chavez - now a D.C. resident - was a senior adviser to the "Ready for Hillary" preparatory committee and has been touting her campaign for at least a year.

For Latinas and African American women, the wage gap is even worse. Latinas make 56 cents for every dollar earned by a white, non-Hispanic man and African American women make 64 cents. A study by the National Women's Law Center found that in 108 of 111 occupations analyzed, the earnings of women were less than the earnings of men.

Equal pay has been a top priority of Congressional Democrats, who passed the Paycheck Fairness Act in the House in 2008, but it was blocked by Senate Republicans. Since then, Congressional Republicans have repeatedly stood in the way of its passage. Among its many provisions, the bill requires employers to show that pay disparity is truly related to job performance, not gender; strengthens remedies for women experiencing pay discrimination; prohibits employer retaliation for sharing salary information with coworkers; and empowers women in the workplace through a grant program to strengthen salary negotiation and other workplace skills.

LUJAN: EQUAL PAY DAY REMINDS US OF IMPORTANCE OF PAYCHECK FAIRNESS ACT

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 373 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District marked Equal Pay Day today, which symbolizes when, more than three months into 2015, women's wages will finally catch up to what men earned last year. On average, women earn 78 cents for every dollar that a man earns. Lujan has co-sponsored the Paycheck Fairness Act, which would provide effective solutions and protections for women who are not being paid equal wages for doing equal work.

"The pay gap between men and women doesn't just impact hard-working women - it impacts their families and their ability to put food on the table, send a child to college, or buy a home," Congressman Lujan said. "At the current rate that the gap has been closing, women won't reach pay equity with men until 2058. That's why women and their families need the Paycheck Fairness Act. As long as hard-working women are making less for the same work, we must fight to pass this important legislation. Because when women succeed, America succeeds."

In New Mexico, women earn 82 cents for every dollar that a man does. While this is slightly higher than the national average, it still represents a gap of more than $7,700 every year. For Latinas and African American women, the wage gap is even worse. Latinas make 56 cents for every dollar earned by a white, non-Hispanic man and African American women make 64 cents. A study by the National Women's Law Center found that in 108 of 111 occupations analyzed, the earnings of women were less than the earnings of men.

New Mexico: UDALL, HEINRICH, LUJAN ANNOUNCE $3.5 MILLION TO RESTORE NAMBE FALLS RESERVOIR, REIMBURSE FIREFIGHTING FOR TRES LAGUNAS FIRE

LENGTH: 560 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

WASHINGTON - U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representative Ben Ray Luján today announced that more than $3.5 million in Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) funding will be awarded to New Mexico to help San Miguel and Santa Fe counties recover from severe fires and flooding. Pojoaque Valley Irrigation District will receive $1,028,174 for emergency repairs to the Nambé Falls Reservoir to clear out debris and sediment that flowed into the reservoir during severe storms and flooding in September 2014. The reservoir provides water for irrigation purposes to nearby communities, which include the pueblos of San Ildefonso, Nambé, and Pojoaque. This funding brings the total amount FEMA has designated for recovery efforts from the September 2014 storms and flooding to more than $2.6 million.

The New Mexico Energy, Minerals and Natural Resources Department will receive $2,478,581 to reimburse firefighting costs incurred while fighting the Tres Lagunas Fire, which threatened hundreds of homes and burned thousands of acres in San Miguel County in May and June of 2013. The funding is being awarded through FEMA's Fire Management Assistance Grant Program, and covers expenses including field camps; equipment use, repair and replacement; tools, materials and supplies; and mobilization and demobilization activities. "I'm pleased that FEMA has provided these additional resources to help clean up the Nambé Falls Reservoir and pay for critical firefighting resources that extinguished the Tres Lagunas Fire and saved hundreds of homes," Udall said. "Fires, severe storms and flooding take a significant toll on our communities, and I'll continue to work to make sure that New Mexico has the resources needed to prevent and fight these disasters, and also mitigate the impact they have on our water resources." "This FEMA funding is critical to the cleanup efforts at Nambé Falls Reservoir, which provides irrigation water to local farmers," Heinrich said. "I'm also pleased federal aid will go toward reimbursing firefighting costs from the Tres Lagunas Fire. I will continue working to ensure communities across New Mexico affected by severe flooding and devastating fires receive the assistance they need to rebuild and recover." "FEMA funds provide critical support to our communities that have been hard hit by flood, fire, and other disasters," Luján said. "These important federal funds will contribute to the effort to restore Nambé Falls Reservoir and protect our water resources that are critical to the livelihood of these communities, particularly during these times of drought. This funding will also help provide our firefighters with the proper resources and equipment as they prepare for the next fire season. I commend our firefighters for their tremendous efforts battling the Tres Lagunas Fire, and I will continue to advocate for the necessary funding to bolster their efforts." The funding will be awarded directly to the state of New Mexico on behalf of Pojoaque Valley Irrigation District and the New Mexico Energy, Minerals and Natural Resources Department, and is expected to cover 75 percent of costs for each project.

Lujan says Obamacare benefiting New Mexicans

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 2

LENGTH: 123 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE

SANTA FE - Third District U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan says in the five years since Congress approved the Affordable Care Act, also known as "Obamacare," the health care law has had a positive impact on New Mexicans.

Lujan, a Democrat, says that for too long New Mexico ranked high on the list of people lacking health insurance, adding the stories heard by people who lacked coverage or those denied coverage because of pre-existing conditions were "heartbreaking."

Lujan says as a result of the act, 16 million Americans who had no health insurance now do. And he says the number of uninsured New Mexicans is down by nearly 5 percent, meaning that thousands of New Mexico families are no longer one accident or illness away from financial ruin.

Gary Johnson says Rand Paul not really Libertarian

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. A10

LENGTH: 669 words

When Kentucky Republican Rand Paul announced his campaign for president last week, one of my first thoughts was how - or if - it would affect Gary Johnson's political plans.

The former governor of New Mexico, an avid mountain climber, is preparing for another uphill climb in running for president.

Johnson campaigned for the White House in 2012, initially as a Republican. But he changed his party affiliation to Libertarian mid-campaign when he realized he couldn't get any traction with the GOP voters who tend to oppose drug legalization, abortion rights, same-sex marriage and relaxed immigration policies - all of which Johnson supports.

The party switch didn't help Johnson's campaign much. He got crushed on Election Day.

But he did manage to eke out 1 percent of the vote - a record for a Libertarian candidate.

Meanwhile, the famously tenacious Johnson is eyeing another run.

Even though Johnson hasn't held public office since 2004 and failed to make much noise with his 2012 presidential campaign, the national media still seems at least somewhat intrigued. MSNBC, Fox, the Daily Caller and other outlets also sought out his opinion on Paul's announcement and whether Johnson hopes to mount another run.

"It is something I would like to do," the former governor told me in a telephone conversation last week. "I do believe I provide a voice that is reflective of most Americans."

But what about Paul, who has a fairly libertarian philosophy of his own? How does his entrance into the presidential race affect Johnson's own calculations?

Not much, the former governor said.

"I think it's a good thing he's running and it's a good thing he's being attached to being a libertarian," Johnson said.

"People are asking me why would you run as a Libertarian candidate when you already have a Libertarian (Paul) running?" Johnson said. "No, we don't. If he was a Libertarian he would be running as a Libertarian."

There are some points on which Johnson and Paul agree, including a desire for tax cuts and a less interventionist U.S. military posture. But Johnson notes that Paul has reigned in his call for defense spending cuts, opposes same-sex marriage and is squishy on the issue of marijuana legalization.

Paul has tried to dodge the pot question to some extent, suggesting the federal government shouldn't legalize it but that states should have some leeway.

"You don't get nominated (in the Republican Party) unless you toe that line," Johnson said.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has called on Republicans to return campaign contributions from disgraced former Rep. Aaron Schock, an Illinois Republican who resigned last month after reporters found that he was using some sketchy accounting to account for the taxpayers' dime.

Some have obliged.

But now that Sen. Bob Menendez, a New Jersey Democrat, has been indicted on corruption charges, some Democrats are turning over now-tainted campaign cash they have received from him.

Count Rep. Ben Ray Luján, a New Mexican who chairs the DCCC, among that group.

Luján's spokesman told me last week he would donate $2,500 he received from Menendez in 2008 to charities in Santa Fe.

"The campaign will donate the money to two local organizations that are doing great work supporting our veterans - Horses for Heroes in Santa Fe and Not Forgotten Outreach in Taos," Luján spokesman Andrew Stoddard said.

Horses for Heroes bills itself as a "horsemanship, wellness and skill-set restructuring program based in Santa Fe, NM free to all post 9/11 veterans and active military (both men and women) especially those who have sustained PTSD, physical injuries, or have experienced combat trauma during their time serving our country."

The Not Forgotten Association describes itself as "a unique national tri-service charity which provides entertainment, leisure and recreation for the serving wounded, injured or sick and for ex-service men and women with disabilities."

Lujan Highlights $200,000 in USDA Grants for Santa Fe Organizations Addressing Hunger

LENGTH: 311 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District highlighted nearly $200,000 in USDA grants for two Santa Fe organizations to address hunger and support the purchase of fruits and vegetables for participants in the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP). The Santa Fe Community Foundation is receiving $100,000 and the New Mexico Farmers Marketing Association is receiving $99,999 through the Food Insecurity Nutrition Incentive program for pilot projects.

"With New Mexico near the top in child hunger and with too many families struggling to put food on the table, SNAP is a critical tool to help during tough times," Congressman Luján said. "These federal grants will support the important efforts of these Santa Fe organizations to help SNAP recipients not only feed their families, but have access to healthy, nutritious food."

The grant awarded to the Santa Fe Community Foundation will help launch MoGro's Healthy SNAP Program, which will provide SNAP families with a 50% discount on fresh and organic produce and provide opportunities for monthly cooking and nutritional workshops. In partnership with La Familia Medical Center, community health workers will also be able to track dietary changes and health improvements.

The New Mexico Farmers Marketing Association will use its grant to help launch "Snap to Health: Double Up Food Bucks New Mexico," which will provide SNAP incentives at farmers' markets in order to increase consumption of fresh fruits and vegetables by low-income customers. The program will also include direct-to-consumer marketing in order to share the benefits of consuming locally grown produce.

Lujan Visits James Rodriguez Elementary School in Espanola, Meets with Students Who Attended White House Science Fair

LENGTH: 507 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District visited James Rodriguez Elementary School in Española yesterday to visit with students, teachers, and faculty and to learn about the science projects the students have been working on. Last month, three students from the school were selected to visit Washington, D.C. to participate in the White House Science Fair and present their project. Casandra Dauz, Jose Valdez, and Jaleena Rolon were joined by their teacher Jimmy Lara.

"Yesterday I had the opportunity to visit with many bright young students at James Rodriguez Elementary who have been hard at work on innovative projects that have helped spark their interest in the STEM fields," Congressman Luján said. "Congratulations to Jaleena, Jose, and Casandra for being selected to visit the White House and for representing New Mexico and making us proud. Their 'City of Crystal Water' illustrates their creativity and inventive spirit. I want to also commend Mr. Lara for his dedication to his students and his efforts to teach them the science and math skills that will be so important to their future."

For their project, the students were challenged to work as team over four months to imagine, design, and build a city of the future. This year's theme was Feeding Future Cities, requiring students to select one vegetable and one protein and design a way to grow enough of each within the city limits to feed its citizens; build a model of their city using recycled materials; write a brief narrative promoting the city; and present their city before a panel of judges.

The students "City of Crystal Water" included fish as a health source of protein and carrots that can be grown without soil using hydroponics. The team used hydro energy and wind turbines to provide energy to the city. They incorporated Spanish, English, American Sign Language, and Tewa into their presentation to reflect the cultural diversity of their communities and earned the Most Unique Architectural Model at the New Mexico regional competition.

Congressman Luján has been a strong advocate for STEM education and expressed his support for projects that encourage students to engage in the STEM fields. He has introduced legislation to strengthen STEM education and training programs to help teachers and schools better engage students in the STEM fields by providing additional professional development resources and facilitating collaboration among the business and education communities to better identify STEM skills needed in the workforce.

"The STEM fields provide opportunities for good jobs in growing sectors and it is critical that we engage students at an early age to encourage them to purse STEM education. We can show kids that instead of just using the latest app, they can be the ones creating it," added Luján.

Udall, Heinrich, Luján Announce $3.5 Million to Restore Nambé Falls Reservoir, Reimburse Firefighting for Tres Lagunas Fire

LENGTH: 561 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Martin Heinrich, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representative Ben Ray Luján today announced that more than $3.5 million in Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) funding will be awarded to New Mexico to help San Miguel and Santa Fe counties recover from severe fires and flooding.

Pojoaque Valley Irrigation District will receive $1,028,174 for emergency repairs to the Nambé Falls Reservoir to clear out debris and sediment that flowed into the reservoir during severe storms and flooding in September 2014. The reservoir provides water for irrigation purposes to nearby communities, which include the pueblos of San Ildefonso, Nambé, and Pojoaque. This funding brings the total amount FEMA has designated for recovery efforts from the September 2014 storms and flooding to more than $2.6 million.

The New Mexico Energy, Minerals and Natural Resources Department will receive $2,478,581 to reimburse firefighting costs incurred while fighting the Tres Lagunas Fire, which threatened hundreds of homes and burned thousands of acres in San Miguel County in May and June of 2013. The funding is being awarded through FEMA's Fire Management Assistance Grant Program, and covers expenses including field camps; equipment use, repair and replacement; tools, materials and supplies; and mobilization and demobilization activities.

"I'm pleased that FEMA has provided these additional resources to help clean up the Nambé Falls Reservoir and pay for critical firefighting resources that extinguished the Tres Lagunas Fire and saved hundreds of homes," Udall said. "Fires, severe storms and flooding take a significant toll on our communities, and I'll continue to work to make sure that New Mexico has the resources needed to prevent and fight these disasters, and also mitigate the impact they have on our water resources."

"This FEMA funding is critical to the cleanup efforts at Nambé Falls Reservoir, which provides irrigation water to local farmers," Heinrich said. "I'm also pleased federal aid will go toward reimbursing firefighting costs from the Tres Lagunas Fire. I will continue working to ensure communities across New Mexico affected by severe flooding and devastating fires receive the assistance they need to rebuild and recover."

"FEMA funds provide critical support to our communities that have been hard hit by flood, fire, and other disasters," Luján said. "These important federal funds will contribute to the effort to restore Nambé Falls Reservoir and protect our water resources that are critical to the livelihood of these communities, particularly during these times of drought. This funding will also help provide our firefighters with the proper resources and equipment as they prepare for the next fire season. I commend our firefighters for their tremendous efforts battling the Tres Lagunas Fire, and I will continue to advocate for the necessary funding to bolster their efforts."

The funding will be awarded directly to the state of New Mexico on behalf of Pojoaque Valley Irrigation District and the New Mexico Energy, Minerals and Natural Resources Department, and is expected to cover 75 percent of costs for each project.

Congressman Lujan has been a strong advocate for STEM education and expressed his support for projects that encourage students to engage in the STEM fields. He has introduced legislation to strengthen STEM education and training programs to help teachers and schools better engage students in the STEM fields by providing additional professional development resources and facilitating collaboration among the business and education communities to better identify STEM skills needed in the workforce.

"The STEM fields provide opportunities for good jobs in growing sectors and it is critical that we engage students at an early age to encourage them to purse STEM education. We can show kids that instead of just using the latest app, they can be the ones creating it," added Lujan.

New Mexico: LUJAN VISITS JAMES RODRIGUEZ ELEMENTARY SCHOOL IN ESPANOLA, MEETS WITH STUDENTS WHO ATTENDED WHITE HOUSE SCIENCE FAIR

LENGTH: 544 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Rep. Luján meets with Casandra Dauz, Jose Valdez, and Jaleena Rolon, students at James Rodriguez Elementary School, to learn about their science project and their visit to Washington, D.C. to attend the White House Science Fair. Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District visited James Rodriguez Elementary School in Española yesterday to visit with students, teachers, and faculty and to learn about the science projects the students have been working on.

Last month, three students from the school were selected to visit Washington, D.C. to participate in the White House Science Fair and present their project. Casandra Dauz, Jose Valdez, and Jaleena Rolon were joined by their teacher Jimmy Lara. "Yesterday I had the opportunity to visit with many bright young students at James Rodriguez Elementary who have been hard at work on innovative projects that have helped spark their interest in the STEM fields," Congressman Luján said. "Congratulations to Jaleena, Jose, and Casandra for being selected to visit the White House and for representing New Mexico and making us proud. Their 'City of Crystal Water' illustrates their creativity and inventive spirit. I want to also commend Mr. Lara for his dedication to his students and his efforts to teach them the science and math skills that will be so important to their future." For their project, the students were challenged to work as team over four months to imagine, design, and build a city of the future. This year's theme was Feeding Future Cities, requiring students to select one vegetable and one protein and design a way to grow enough of each within the city limits to feed its citizens; build a model of their city using recycled materials; write a brief narrative promoting the city; and present their city before a panel of judges. The students "City of Crystal Water" included fish as a health source of protein and carrots that can be grown without soil using hydroponics. The team used hydro energy and wind turbines to provide energy to the city. They incorporated Spanish, English, American Sign Language, and Tewa into their presentation to reflect the cultural diversity of their communities and earned the Most Unique Architectural Model at the New Mexico regional competition. Congressman Luján has been a strong advocate for STEM education and expressed his support for projects that encourage students to engage in the STEM fields. He has introduced legislation to strengthen STEM education and training programs to help teachers and schools better engage students in the STEM fields by providing additional professional development resources and facilitating collaboration among the business and education communities to better identify STEM skills needed in the workforce. "The STEM fields provide opportunities for good jobs in growing sectors and it is critical that we engage students at an early age to encourage them to purse STEM education. New Mexico: LUJAN STATEMENT ON CESAR CHAVEZ DAY

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today to commemorate César Chávez Day, which is celebrated on March 31. "The United States has been built on the foundation of men and women who refused to accept injustice and who fought to improve their lives and the lives of those around them. Today, as we reflect on the legacy of César Chávez, we remember a man who dedicated his life to the cause of equality and led the effort for social justice for working men and women. "A son of migrant workers who grew up during the Great Depression, César Chávez endured in his belief that the American Dream was not exclusive. He harnessed the steadfast power of working people and defied the forces of discrimination and injustice in order to win the basic rights and protections that all workers deserve. "Today we are reminded that we are at our best when we come together united in the cause for justice, but we are also reminded that this fight is ongoing. We are compelled to take up this cause and endure, just as César Chávez did, in order to secure a future that is worthy of the dreams and aspirations of all people."

New Mexico: Lujan Statement on Fifth Anniversary of the Affordable Care Act

LENGTH: 247 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on the fifth anniversary of the Affordable Care Act being signed into law.

"The Affordable Care Act is working, and it is having a real impact on the lives of the people of New Mexico. For too long, New Mexico has ranked high on the list of the uninsured. As a result of the Affordable Care Act, the number of uninsured New Mexicans has started to fall, decreasing by nearly 5 percent. This means that thousands of families are no longer one accident or illness away from financial ruin.

"Five years after the ACA was signed into law, more than 16 million Americans who did not have health coverage now do. In addition, 129 million Americans have the peace of mind of knowing that they will not be dropped from their plan or discriminated against because of a pre-existing condition. Seniors are saving money on their prescription medicine, women can no longer be charged more just for being a woman, and no New Mexican has to fear hitting a lifetime limit on their health coverage.

"Moving forward, Congress should work in a bipartisan effort to strengthen the law and make improvements that will further lower costs and increase access to care for New Mexicans and the American people.

New Mexico: Lujan Statement on the Death of Mayor George Gonzales

LENGTH: 242 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement on the death of former Santa Fe Mayor George Gonzales, who passed away last night.

"Last night we lost a great New Mexico leader from the Santa Fe community whose contributions extended from his efforts in City Hall to his daily work on the airwaves. George Gonzales loved Santa Fe and its people and sought to build a stronger community through his passion for service and music.

"Beginning in his early years as a singer-songwriter, his deep interest in music guided him through life, leading him to own local Santa Fe radio stations. His familiar voice informed, uplifted, and enriched all those who tuned in to listen to his daily messages celebrating a birthday, an anniversary, or the memory of lost loved one.

"George Gonzales' love to help people was only exceeded by his love for his family. While we say goodbye to Mr. Gonzales, his legacy lives on in his children who have followed in his footsteps. Mr. Gonzales will be greatly missed, but their good work ensures that his memory lives on. My thoughts and prayers are with the Gonzales family during this sad time, and on behalf of the Luján family, I express our sincere condolences for their loss."

New Mexico: N.M. Delegation Encourages Department of Defense to Support UNM's Proposal to Create National Institute of Photonics

LENGTH: 582 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Initiative will create jobs, build on N.M.'s unique expertise in optics and photonics, delegation says in letter to Defense Secretary to select a proposal led by a team that includes the University of New Mexico in a competition to create a national photonics hub. The team, a collaboration of academic institutions from New Mexico and three other states, was named a finalist earlier this year. If selected, it will receive federal funding and support and become part of a network of regional manufacturing institutes or "hubs" across the country that help bridge the gap between applied research and product development. The hub would spur the development of cutting-edge technology and create high-tech jobs in the Albuquerque area.

The New Mexico congressional delegation has strongly supported the UNM team's application, which would establish the first such manufacturing hub west of the Mississippi as part of the Integrated Photonics Institute for Manufacturing Innovation (IP-IMI) program. Photonics technologies are used in robotics, medical imaging, next-generation displays, defense, biometric security and many other fields. The group could receive $110 million in federal grant matching funds to develop a partnership between industry, government and academia to accelerate the creation of new photonics technologies. UNM would serve as the lead sensing hub, focusing on the development of integrated phonic sensors for chem-bio sensing.

In a letter to Secretary of Defense Ashton Carter, all five members of New Mexico's congressional delegation expressed their strong support for the proposal.

"This team will bring together government, industry and academia to develop this manufacturing ecosystem here in the U.S. They have broad talents and proven track records in microelectronics and chip packaging, as well as significant expertise in world-class photonics manufacturing," the letter reads. "New Mexico's unique capabilities in Mid Infrared photonic systems have served our DOD and commercial industries for decades. UNM will stand up the New Mexico Hub on Sensing-Integrated Manufacturing for Mid-infrared Photonic Applications Technology (IMMPACT) which will work toward self-sufficiency."

"The U.S. photonics industry currently supports more than 100,000 high-paying jobs, a number that could double within the next decade as new photonic-electronic chips find their way into products and technologies across many industries," the letter continues. "The combined team's established research and development in critical areas of this technology, coupled with its electronics and photonics packaging expertise, will build a pipeline of innovation and talent for this high-tech industry."

The UNM team is led by the Information Science Institute at the University of Southern California and also includes the University of California system schools in Los Angeles, San Diego and Berkeley; Arizona State University; and Ohio State University. The team is competing against two others based in New York and Florida. Full and final applications are due by March 31, and the final selection is expected in June 2015.

New Mexico: Lujan: House Republican Budget Stands in Stark Contrast to Democrats' Efforts to Support Hard-Working Families

LENGTH: 292 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting against House Republicans' budget for Fiscal Year 2016.

"A budget is a statement of values, and the contrast between the House Republican budget that puts special interests first and the House Democratic budget that invests in growing the middle class could not be clearer. House Republicans provide tax breaks to billionaires, yet shortchange investments in early education that are vital to our children's future and infrastructure that are essential to putting more New Mexicans to work. House Democrats invest in job training programs, education at every level, and clean energy - critical components for strengthening our nation's competitiveness and building a stronger economy that creates more jobs and opportunities for the people of New Mexico.

"Once again, House Republicans call for the end of Medicare as we know it by replacing it with a voucher that fails to cover the cost of health care for New Mexico's seniors, leaving them to pay higher out-of-pocket costs. At a time when New Mexico ranks near the top in child hunger, the Republican budget lays the foundation for cuts to nutrition programs that help families put food on the table during difficult times.

"While I may not agree with every provision in each alternative Democratic budget, they all stand in stark contrast to the Republican plan by supporting hard-working families through investments in infrastructure, affordable college education, and growing paychecks."

New Mexico: Lujan: VA Change to 40-Mile Rule a Commonsense Step Forward to Better Meet the Needs of New Mexico Veterans

LENGTH: 280 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District highlighted a recent decision by the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) to modify a rule that determines eligibility for the Veterans Choice Program. Under the current version, veterans are eligible to seek care for a doctor outside the VA system if they are more than 40 miles away from a VA facility "as the crow flies." The announced change will measure driving distance, enabling more veterans to receive care closer to home.

"In rural communities across New Mexico, veterans have had to travel great distances to receive the care they have earned with their brave service. Under the Veterans Choice Program, Congress took an important step to make it easier for them to receive care closer to their own communities," Congressman Luján said. "As we know in New Mexico, the path between two points is not always a straight line; it's through mountain passes and valleys. The announced change to this rule is a commonsense step to reflect the realities we face in rural communities, to better meet the needs of New Mexico's veterans and to better follow the intent of the law."

The Veterans Choice Program was created as part of the Veterans' Access to Care through Choice, Accountability, and Transparency Act, which passed with Luján's support last July. The law provides key funding to reduce the VA backlog, hire new medical personnel at VA hospitals and clinics, and allow the VA to lease new medical facilities.

New Mexico: Lujan Votes to Protect Seniors' Access to Their Doctor and Extend Health Care for Children

LENGTH: 235 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District voted today in support of the Medicare Access and CHIP Reauthorization Act, bipartisan legislation to protect seniors' access to doctors through Medicare.

"Year after year for more than a decade, Congress has passed short-term fixes to a flawed system in order to prevent seniors on Medicare from losing access to the doctors they trust. Time and again, rather than enacting a stable payment system for doctors, Congress has kicked the can down the road. Finally, a bipartisan effort has led to a compromise to permanently ensure seniors' can continue to see their doctor.

"This legislation combines needed reforms in the way we reimburse doctors through Medicare to promote quality care with a vital extension of the Children's Health Insurance Program that prevents 2 million children from becoming uninsured. In addition, it provides critical funding for community health centers that play a significant role in the effort to expand access to affordable health care in New Mexico.

"While not perfect, this legislation represents a compromise that on the whole makes much-needed progress in ensuring access to health care for our children and seniors."

New Mexico: Lujan Presents Medals to Navy Veteran Gus Keene in Gallup

LENGTH: 330 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Rep. Ben Ray Luján pins a medal on Gus Keene at a ceremony in Gallup this morning. Luján helped secure the medals Mr. Keene earned through his service in the U.S. Navy.

Gallup, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District awarded a number of medals to Navy veteran Gus Keene this morning at a ceremony in Gallup. He was joined by Commander Dave Cuellar, U.S. Navy (Ret.), founder of Veterans Helping Veterans.

A native of Acoma Pueblo, Gus Keene was drafted into the Navy in 1965 from Tuba City, Arizona. After completing boot camp in Long Beach, California, Mr. Keene was stationed aboard the USS Bennington and completed several combat tours with the 7th Fleet during the Vietnam War. During one of his tours, Mr. Keene and the USS Bennington responded to aid the USS Pueblo when it was captured by North Korean ships.

When Mr. Keene completed his service, he was not informed of his eligibility for a number of medals. When he realized that his time and efforts in the Navy had earned him these medals, he contacted Congressman Luján's office for help.

"Mr. Keene bravely served his country and has added to New Mexico's proud legacy of military service," said Congressman Lujan. "I am honored that we had the opportunity to assist Mr. Keene and ensure that he received the medals and the thanks he earned."

"I want to thank the Congressman for all his hard work," said Mr. Keene. "It's great to finally get the honor we as veterans all deserve."

Congressman Luján and his staff worked on behalf of Mr. Keene to obtain the following medals that he earned for his brave military service prior to his Honorable Discharge in 1969:

o National Defense Medal
o Vietnam Service Medal with a Silver Star
o Meritorious Unit Commendation Ribbon with a Bronze Star
o Good Conduct Medal

New Mexico: Lujan Statement on Cesar Chavez Day

LENGTH: 226 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today to commemorate César Chávez Day, which is celebrated on March 31.

"The United States has been built on the foundation of men and women who refused to accept injustice and who fought to improve their lives and the lives of those around them. Today, as we reflect on the legacy of César Chávez, we remember a man who dedicated his life to the cause of equality and led the effort for social justice for working men and women.

"A son of migrant workers who grew up during the Great Depression, César Chávez endured in his belief that the American Dream was not exclusive. He harnessed the steadfast power of working people and defied the forces of discrimination and injustice in order to win the basic rights and protections that all workers deserve.

"Today we are reminded that we are at our best when we come together united in the cause for justice, but we are also reminded that this fight is ongoing. We are compelled to take up this cause and endure, just as César Chávez did, in order to secure a future that is worthy of the dreams and aspirations of all people."

New Mexico: N.M. Delegation Encourages Department of Defense to Support UNM's Proposal to Create National Institute of Photonics

LENGTH: 582 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Initiative will create jobs, build on N.M.'s unique expertise in optics and photonics, delegation says in letter to Defense Secretary

WASHINGTON - Today, U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham announced that they are urging the Department of Defense to select a proposal led by a team that includes the University of New Mexico in a competition to create a national photonics hub. The team, a collaboration of academic institutions from New Mexico and three other states, was named a finalist earlier this year. If selected, it will receive federal funding and support and become part of a network of regional manufacturing institutes or "hubs" across the country that help bridge the gap between applied research and product development. The hub would spur the development of cutting-edge technology and create high-tech jobs in the Albuquerque area.

The New Mexico congressional delegation has strongly supported the UNM team's application, which would establish the first such manufacturing hub west of the Mississippi as part of the Integrated Photonics Institute for Manufacturing Innovation (IP-IMI) program. Photonics technologies are used in robotics, medical imaging, next-generation displays, defense, biometric security and many other fields. The group could receive $110 million in federal grant matching funds to develop a partnership between industry, government and academia to accelerate the creation of new photonics technologies. UNM would serve as the lead sensing hub, focusing on the development of integrated phonic sensors for chem-bio sensing.

In a letter to Secretary of Defense Ashton Carter, all five members of New Mexico's congressional delegation expressed their strong support for the proposal.

"This team will bring together government, industry and academia to develop this manufacturing ecosystem here in the U.S. They have broad talents and proven track records in microelectronics and chip packaging, as well as significant expertise in world-class photonics manufacturing," the letter reads. "New Mexico's unique capabilities in Mid Infrared photonic systems have served our DOD and commercial industries for decades. UNM will stand up the New Mexico Hub on Sensing-Integrated Manufacturing for Mid-infrared Photonic Applications Technology (IMMPACT) which will work toward self-sufficiency."

"The U.S. photonics industry currently supports more than 100,000 high-paying jobs, a number that could double within the next decade as new photonic-electronic chips find their way into products and technologies across many industries," the letter continues. "The combined team's established research and development in critical areas of this technology, coupled with its electronics and photonics packaging expertise, will build a pipeline of innovation and talent for this high-tech industry."

The UNM team is led by the Information Science Institute at the University of Southern California and also includes the University of California system schools in Los Angeles, San Diego and Berkeley; Arizona State University; and Ohio State University. The team is competing against two others based in New York and Florida. Full and final applications are due by March 31, and the final selection is expected in June 2015.

New Mexico: Lujan: House Republican Budget Stands in Stark Contrast to Democrats' Efforts to Support Hard-Working Families

LENGTH: 292 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting against House Republicans' budget for Fiscal Year 2016.

"A budget is a statement of values, and the contrast between the House Republican budget that puts special interests first and the House Democratic budget that invests in growing the middle class could not be clearer. House Republicans provide tax breaks to billionaires, yet shortchange investments in early education that are vital to our children's future and infrastructure that are essential to putting more New Mexicans to work. House Democrats invest in job training programs, education at every level, and clean energy - critical components for strengthening our nation's competitiveness and building a stronger economy that creates more jobs and opportunities for the people of New Mexico.

"Once again, House Republicans call for the end of Medicare as we know it by replacing it with a voucher that fails to cover the cost of health care for New Mexico's seniors, leaving them to pay higher out-of-pocket costs. At a time when New Mexico ranks near the top in child hunger, the Republican budget lays the foundation for cuts to nutrition programs that help families put food on the table during difficult times.

"While I may not agree with every provision in each alternative Democratic budget, they all stand in stark contrast to the Republican plan by supporting hard-working families through investments in infrastructure, affordable college education, and growing paychecks."

New Mexico: Lujan: VA Change to 40-Mile Rule a Commonsense Step Forward to Better Meet the Needs of New Mexico Veterans

LENGTH: 280 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District highlighted a recent decision by the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) to modify a rule that determines eligibility for the Veterans Choice Program. Under the current version, veterans are eligible to seek care for a doctor outside the VA system if they are more than 40 miles away from a VA facility "as the crow flies." The announced change will measure driving distance, enabling more veterans to receive care closer to home.

"In rural communities across New Mexico, veterans have had to travel great distances to receive the care they have earned with their brave service. Under the Veterans Choice Program, Congress took an important step to make it easier for them to receive care closer to their own communities," Congressman Luján said. "As we know in New Mexico, the path between two points is not always a straight line; it's through mountain passes and valleys. The announced change to this rule is a commonsense step to reflect the realities we face in rural communities, to better meet the needs of New Mexico's veterans and to better follow the intent of the law."

The Veterans Choice Program was created as part of the Veterans' Access to Care through Choice, Accountability, and Transparency Act, which passed with Luján's support last July. The law provides key funding to reduce the VA backlog, hire new medical personnel at VA hospitals and clinics, and allow the VA to lease new medical facilities.

New Mexico: Lujan Votes to Protect Seniors' Access to Their Doctor and Extend Health Care for Children

LENGTH: 235 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District voted today in support of the Medicare Access and CHIP Reauthorization Act, bipartisan legislation to protect seniors' access to doctors through Medicare.

"Year after year for more than a decade, Congress has passed short-term fixes to a flawed system in order to prevent seniors on Medicare from losing access to the doctors they trust. Time and again, rather than enacting a stable payment system for doctors, Congress has kicked the can down the road. Finally, a bipartisan effort has led to a compromise to permanently ensure seniors' can continue to see their doctor.

"This legislation combines needed reforms in the way we reimburse doctors through Medicare to promote quality care with a vital extension of the Children's Health Insurance Program that prevents 2 million children from becoming uninsured. In addition, it provides critical funding for community health centers that play a significant role in the effort to expand access to affordable health care in New Mexico.

"While not perfect, this legislation represents a compromise that on the whole makes much-needed progress in ensuring access to health care for our children and seniors."

New Mexico: Lujan Presents Medals to Navy Veteran Gus Keene in Gallup

LENGTH: 330 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Rep. Ben Ray Luján pins a medal on Gus Keene at a ceremony in Gallup this morning. Luján helped secure the medals Mr. Keene earned through his service in the U.S. Navy.

Gallup, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District awarded a number of medals to Navy veteran Gus Keene this morning at a ceremony in Gallup. He was joined by Commander Dave Cuellar, U.S. Navy (Ret.), founder of Veterans Helping Veterans.

A native of Acoma Pueblo, Gus Keene was drafted into the Navy in 1965 from Tuba City, Arizona. After completing boot camp in Long Beach, California, Mr. Keene was stationed aboard the USS Bennington and completed several combat tours with the 7th Fleet during the Vietnam War. During one of his tours, Mr. Keene and the USS Bennington responded to aid the USS Pueblo when it was captured by North Korean ships.

When Mr. Keene completed his service, he was not informed of his eligibility for a number of medals. When he realized that his time and efforts in the Navy had earned him these medals, he contacted Congressman Luján's office for help.

"Mr. Keene bravely served his country and has added to New Mexico's proud legacy of military service," said Congressman Lujan. "I am honored that we had the opportunity to assist Mr. Keene and ensure that he received the medals and the thanks he earned."

"I want to thank the Congressman for all his hard work," said Mr. Keene. "It's great to finally get the honor we as veterans all deserve."

Congressman Luján and his staff worked on behalf of Mr. Keene to obtain the following medals that he earned for his brave military service prior to his Honorable Discharge in 1969:

o National Defense Medal
o Vietnam Service Medal with a Silver Star
o Meritorious Unit Commendation Ribbon with a Bronze Star
o Good Conduct Medal

Lujan Statement on Cesar Chavez Day

LENGTH: 231 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today to commemorate César Chávez Day, which is celebrated on March 31.

"The United States has been built on the foundation of men and women who refused to accept injustice and who fought to improve their lives and the lives of those around them. Today, as we reflect on the legacy of César Chávez, we remember a man who dedicated his life to the cause of equality and led the effort for social justice for working men and women.

"A son of migrant workers who grew up during the Great Depression, César Chávez endured in his belief that the American Dream was not exclusive. He harnessed the steadfast power of working people and defied the forces of discrimination and injustice in order to win the basic rights and protections that all workers deserve.

"Today we are reminded that we are at our best when we come together united in the cause for justice, but we are also reminded that this fight is ongoing. We are compelled to take up this cause and endure, just as César Chávez did, in order to secure a future that is worthy of the dreams and aspirations of all people."

Vietnam vet receives medals, warm welcome home

ALLUP -- When Acoma resident Gus Keene joined the U.S. Navy during the Vietnam war, the first thing that happened was he was thrown into a pool.

"They wanted to see if I could swim," Keene said.

He could swim. He was assigned for duty to the USS Bennington in 1964 and served on the ship until the end of his tour of duty in 1969.

Monday, Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., was in town to present medals and ribbons to Keene -- medals he never received or even knew he was eligible for his service to the country.

"I never received anything," Keene said.

The ceremony was in the City Hall Council room and members of Veterans Helping Veterans, the City Council and the County Commission were present. The group said the pledge of allegiance and a prayer was recited before the medal award ceremony.

"We get to acknowledge one here today that had not been acknowledged before," Lujan said and talked about how this year was the 50th anniversary of the war, when troops were sent in to Vietnam.

"I was at the Santa Fe Cemetery and I want to say I'm sorry and welcome home," Lujan said.

Keene received the National Defense medal ribbon, the Vietnam Service Medal with a Silver Star ribbon and the Meritorious Unit Accommodation ribbon with a Bronze Star medal, and a Good Conduct Medal.

Lujan pinned the medals and ribbons on Keene's jacket.

"Thank you for this recognition," Keene said. "To my brothers and sisters, thank you as well. It's been a long time waiting and when we all come home, we were not ever recognized like other individuals from Iraq and Afghanistan, for their service and support. Welcome home brothers and sisters, welcome home.

"My father was in Normandy but he was never recognized either. We'll work on his awards."

Keene thanked his wife, which he jokingly referred to as his "chauffer," and a prayer closed the ceremony.

Welcome home Gus Keene.

FCC Chairman Tom Wheeler backs moving forward with the universal service program's high-cost loop support (HCLS) mechanism, he told Sen. Jerry Moran, R-Kan., in a March 17 letter released last week. "We believe it is important to move forward with implementation of this mechanism to ensure that universal service funds are being used as cost effectively and efficiently as possible," Wheeler said, noting the FCC will be considering a petition for reconsideration from the National Congress of American Indians. "In the meantime, however, please be assured that we will closely monitor the effects of the interim HCLS mechanism on rate-of-return carriers, particularly those that serve Indian Country, and will revisit this issue in the event that it has unanticipated results," he said. Wheeler sent a different letter on the same topic to other lawmakers March 16. The FCC Office of Native Affairs and Policy "is considering potential dates in 2015 when I can meet personally with the Tribally-owned rate-of-return carriers to discuss their concerns," he said in a letter to Sens. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M, and Tom Udall, D-N.M., and Reps. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., and Steve Pearce, R-N.M.

U.S. Rep. Lujan touts natural gas in Farmington visit

BYLINE: By Dan Schwartz The Daily Times

SECTION: NEWS

LENGTH: 556 words

FARMINGTON San Juan County can strengthen its economy by retrofitting vehicles to run on natural gas and propane, U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan said Tuesday during a local visit.

"It's a good concept," said Lujan, the Democratic representative for District 3.

He said converting engines to burn natural gas or propane would create jobs and use New Mexico's resources to make money and keep it circulating locally.

He supports the Natural Gas Act, which proposes incentives for buying and building natural-gas vehicles, he said. But the Farmington region needs fueling stations before large numbers of trucks, buses and cars can be converted, he said.

Lujan toured Farmington on Tuesday, visiting Navajo Preparatory School in the morning, as well as the new Farmington Community Health Center. He appeared before the volunteer group the Farmington Noonday Civitans at noon and then met with at least 20 people at the Sycamore Park Community Center during the afternoon.

In the afternoon meeting, Bloomfield resident MP Schildmeyer told Lujan about a two-year study of the San Juan and Animas rives in San Juan County. The study's results, which recently were presented, surprised scientists . The study showed there were significant levels of bacteria in the rivers that indicate the presence of human waste.

"The pollution we have here is human," Schildmeyer said.

She asked Lujan if there is federal aid to clean the rivers.

Lujan said he will work to find funds, but Congress can no longer earmark federal money for projects. Water, he said, is an important resource.

Another woman said Lujan does not visit Farmington as often as he visits Rio Rancho.

"Ma'am, we've been here quite a bit," Lujan said.

According to spokesman Andrew Stoddard, the congressman represents one of the country's largest congressional districts, and he's driven approximately 70,000 miles across northern New Mexico, including coming to San Juan County for a two-day trip in July. Stoddard said in an email that Lujan has visited the area four times in a little more than two years.

Others asked the congressman about campaign finance reform, the Affordable Care Act and the rising cost of retirement. One woman, a member of the Navajo Nation, said oil and gas companies are drilling on sacred land without consulting tribal officials.

Afterward, Lujan met privately at the community center with groups of people to discuss their issues.

Lujan said he advocates for long-term funding of a federal program that provides San Juan County approximately $2.2 million a year.

The program, known as the Payment in Lieu of Taxes program, compensates counties nationally though largely those in Western states for the federal land within their borders that cannot be developed or included in property tax collections.

PILT has awarded counties hundreds of million of dollars since the program was initiated in 1976. But since 2012, the program has been funded only on a year-to-year basis and often in the last hours before Congress adjourns, leaving county officials uncertain about how much money they can count on.

Lujan said he signed a letter with many of his colleagues supporting long-term PILT funding.

"The ultimate goal is to get multi-year funding," he said.

New Mexico: Lujan Statement on DHS Funding

LENGTH: 193 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting for a clean bill to fund the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) through the end of the fiscal year.

"By finally joining Democrats in passing a full-year funding bill - a bill that House Republicans could have brought up for a vote anytime in the last three months - the Department of Homeland Security will now have the resources and certainty it needs.

"Since last year, Republicans' political games with stopgap funding bills have had a negative impact on the Department's ability to plan and allocate billions of dollars in grants that fund local emergency management programs that support first responders, such as firefighters and EMTs. DHS will now be able to move forward with these critical grants, but not before the American people learned that House Republicans are willing to put their political security ahead of America's national security."

New Mexico: Lujan Statement on Women's History Month

LENGTH: 333 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on Women's History Month, which is celebrated during the month of March.

"Women's History Month is an opportunity to reflect on the contributions and achievements that women have made in every aspect of our society. As we celebrate the progress that has been made, we must continue to push for greater equality, not only for women today, but also for the next generations of women.

"We must continue to fight for fairness in the workplace and commit to policies that support women and their families. Women have an increasingly stronger presence in the workforce; however, a wage gap still exists with women only earning 78 cents for every dollar earned by men, and women of color earning even less. More and more women act as both caretakers and earners, making the issues of paycheck fairness and equal pay important to not just women, but to their families and our economy.

"Expanding educational opportunities for all Americans, including young women, is of critical importance, particularly when it comes to the fields of science, technology, engineering and math that are vital to our economic competitiveness. Women are underrepresented in the STEM fields despite the fact that many discoveries by women have pioneered modern technology and pushed the boundaries of what is possible in the pursuit of knowledge. Encouraging people to study STEM at an early age, especially young ladies, is critical to ensure that instead of just using the next great app, they will be the one to create it.

"This Women's History Month, let us celebrate all that women have accomplished and contributed while continuing to advocate for equality and greater opportunity, because when women succeed, America succeeds."

New Mexico: Lujan Announces Congressional Art Competition for High School Students

LENGTH: 742 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District announced today details for this year's Congressional Art Competition. This annual competition allows members of Congress to display the talent and creativity of their high school constituents. The winning entry from each Congressional district will be displayed as part of an exhibit in the United States Capitol for one year. The winner will travel to Washington, D.C. for a reception honoring the national winners.

"The Congressional Art Competition gives New Mexico's young artists the opportunity to display their fine work and share their talents on the national stage," Congressman Luján said. "I look forward to seeing the creative work from the next generation of artists who will continue in the rich artistic tradition that has long been a part of New Mexico's heritage and culture."

The competition is open to all high school students within the Third Congressional District of New Mexico. All entries must be submitted to Luján's Santa Fe district office by Tuesday, April 7, 2015 at 5 p.m. The winner will be announced at a reception on Saturday, April 11.

2015 3rd Congressional District of New Mexico General Guidelines for Students

A photo of each piece of artwork should be submitted with each piece of artwork (Rep. Luján's office will take a photo of the artwork if the student is unable to produce a photo for submission).
A completed 2015 Congressional Art Competition Student Information and Release Form (signed by a parent or guardian if the student is under the age of 18), must be submitted with each piece of artwork.
Winner need not be present at the reception to win.
Recognition will be given to the top placing pieces of artwork, with the winning piece being displayed in Washington, D.C.
Artwork must be submitted for review and judging by Tuesday, April 7, 2015 at 5 p.m. to the Santa Fe office of Rep. Luján.

New Mexico: Lujan Statement on DHS Funding

LENGTH: 193 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting for a clean bill to fund the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) through the end of the fiscal year.

"By finally joining Democrats in passing a full-year funding bill - a bill that House Republicans could have brought up for a vote anytime in the last three months - the Department of Homeland Security will now have the resources and certainty it needs.

"Since last year, Republicans' political games with stopgap funding bills have had a negative impact on the Department's ability to plan and allocate billions of dollars in grants that fund local emergency management programs that support first responders, such as firefighters and EMTs. DHS will now be able to move forward with these critical grants, but not before the American people learned that House Republicans are willing to put their political security ahead of America's national security."

New Mexico: Lujan Statement on Women's History Month

LENGTH: 333 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on Women's History Month, which is celebrated during the month of March.

"Women's History Month is an opportunity to reflect on the contributions and achievements that women have made in every aspect of our society. As we celebrate the progress that has been made, we must continue to push for greater equality, not only for women today, but also for the next generations of women.

"We must continue to fight for fairness in the workplace and commit to policies that support women and their families. Women have an increasingly stronger presence in the workforce; however, a wage gap still exists with women only earning 78 cents for every dollar earned by men, and women of color earning even less. More and more women act as both caretakers and earners, making the issues of paycheck fairness and equal pay important to not just women, but to their families and our economy.

"Expanding educational opportunities for all Americans, including young women, is of critical importance, particularly when it comes to the fields of science, technology, engineering and math that are vital to our economic competitiveness. Women are underrepresented in the STEM fields despite the fact that many discoveries by women have pioneered modern technology and pushed the boundaries of what is possible in the pursuit of knowledge. Encouraging people to study STEM at an early age, especially young ladies, is critical to ensure that instead of just using the next great app, they will be the one to create it.

"This Women's History Month, let us celebrate all that women have accomplished and contributed while continuing to advocate for equality and greater opportunity, because when women succeed, America succeeds."

New Mexico: Lujan Announces Congressional Art Competition for High School Students

LENGTH: 742 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District announced today details for this year's Congressional Art Competition. This annual competition allows members of Congress to display the talent and creativity of their high school constituents. The winning entry from each Congressional district will be displayed as part of an exhibit in the United States Capitol for one year. The winner will travel to Washington, D.C. for a reception honoring the national winners.

"The Congressional Art Competition gives New Mexico's young artists the opportunity to display their fine work and share their talents on the national stage," Congressman Luján said. "I look forward to seeing the creative work from the next generation of artists who will continue in the rich artistic tradition that has long been a part of New Mexico's heritage and culture."

The competition is open to all high school students within the Third Congressional District of New Mexico. All entries must be submitted to Luján's Santa Fe district office by Tuesday, April 7, 2015 at 5 p.m. The winner will be announced at a reception on Saturday, April 11.

2015 3rd Congressional District of New Mexico General Guidelines for Students

A photo of each piece of artwork should be submitted with each piece of artwork (Rep. Luján's office will take a photo of the artwork if the student is unable to produce a photo for submission).
A completed 2015 Congressional Art Competition Student Information and Release Form (signed by a parent or guardian if the student is under the age of 18), must be submitted with each piece of artwork.
Winner need not be present at the reception to win.
Recognition will be given to the top placing pieces of artwork, with the winning piece being displayed in Washington, D.C.
Artwork must be submitted for review and judging by Tuesday, April 7, 2015 at 5 p.m. to the Santa Fe office of Rep. Luján.

LUJAN PRESENTS MEDALS TO NAVY VETERAN GUS KEENE IN GALLUP;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 318 words

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan pins a medal on Gus Keene at a ceremony in Gallup this morning. Lujan helped secure the medals Mr. Keene earned through his service in the U.S. Navy.

Gallup, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District awarded a number of medals to Navy veteran Gus Keene this morning at a ceremony in Gallup. He was joined by Commander Dave Cuellar, U.S. Navy (Ret.), founder of Veterans Helping Veterans.

A native of Acoma Pueblo, Gus Keene was drafted into the Navy in 1965 from Tuba City, Arizona. After completing boot camp in Long Beach, California, Mr. Keene was stationed aboard the USS Bennington and completed several combat tours with the 7th Fleet during the Vietnam War. During one of his tours, Mr. Keene and the USS Bennington responded to aid the USS Pueblo when it was captured by North Korean ships.

When Mr. Keene completed his service, he was not informed of his eligibility for a number of medals. When he realized that his time and efforts in the Navy had earned him these medals, he contacted Congressman Lujan's office for help.

"Mr. Keene bravely served his country and has added to New Mexico's proud legacy of military service," said Congressman Lujan. "I am honored that we had the opportunity to assist Mr. Keene and ensure that he received the medals and the thanks he earned."

"I want to thank the Congressman for all his hard work," said Mr. Keene. "It's great to finally get the honor we as veterans all deserve."

Congressman Lujan and his staff worked on behalf of Mr. Keene to obtain the following medals that he earned for his brave military service prior to his Honorable Discharge in 1969:

* National Defense Medal

* Vietnam Service Medal with a Silver Star

* Meritorious Unit Commendation Ribbon with a Bronze Star

* Good Conduct Medal

House moves to protect doctors' Medicare payments; Bill may add $500B to national debt

BYLINE: Copyright © 2015 Albuquerque Journal BY MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

LENGTH: 468 words

WASHINGTON - In a rare display of bipartisanship, all three of New Mexico's U.S. House members this week voted to reform the federal payment system for Medicare providers and renew a health insurance program for children.

The legislation, which passed the House 392-37 but still needs Senate approval, aims to overhaul the Medicare pricing system for physicians - a long-sought goal of Congress and the health care industry.

The legislation would likely raise premiums for some Medicare recipients and also would extend the State Children's Health Insurance Program - or S-CHIP - by two years instead of the four years Democrats had sought.

The non-partisan Center for Budget Priorities on Friday estimated that the bill would add $500 billion to the national debt over the next two decades. Only about one-third, or $70 billion, of the new spending would be offset through a combination of provider reductions, increased means-testing of Medicare premiums and other minor reforms, according to the Center.

The bill would repeal the so-called Medicare Sustainable Growth Rate formula and replace it with a formula that provides stability for Medicare physician payments by raising reimbursements by 0.5 percent a year for five years.

The bill "is a critical first step that will help provide seniors with access to quality health care, while ensuring doctors will be able to continue serving them within the Medicare program," said Rep. Steve Pearce, the New Mexico delegation's lone Republican. "This is not a perfect bill, but it is a course correction."

The Medicare payment system originates from a 1997 law that tied physician payments to the growth of the economy. But doctors faced double-digit reimbursement cuts as health care costs grew faster than the economy - leaving Congress to step in most years with a temporary fix to block the formula from working.

If President Barack Obama doesn't sign the bill into law by Tuesday, a 21 percent cut in Medicare payments would go into effect.

"I am proud to support a bipartisan compromise that ensures seniors will continue to have access to the doctors they know and trust," said Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M.

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., noted the bill also contains money for community health centers.

"While not perfect, this legislation represents a compromise that on the whole makes much-needed progress in ensuring access to health care for our children and seniors," he said.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., said the senator "would very much like to resolve the Medicare doctors' payments once and for all" but he also prefers more than two years of S-CHIP funding in the bill. He has not yet determined his position on the House bill, she said.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., said the senator was still evaluating the bill.

Lujan: House Republican Budget Stands in Stark Contrast to Democrats' Efforts to Support Hard-Working Families

LENGTH: 295 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting against House Republicans' budget for Fiscal Year 2016.

"A budget is a statement of values, and the contrast between the House Republican budget that puts special interests first and the House Democratic budget that invests in growing the middle class could not be clearer. House Republicans provide tax breaks to billionaires, yet shortchange investments in early education that are vital to our children's future and infrastructure that are essential to putting more New Mexicans to work. House Democrats invest in job training programs, education at every level, and clean energy - critical components for strengthening our nation's competitiveness and building a stronger economy that creates more jobs and opportunities for the people of New Mexico.

"Once again, House Republicans call for the end of Medicare as we know it by replacing it with a voucher that fails to cover the cost of health care for New Mexico's seniors, leaving them to pay higher out-of-pocket costs. At a time when New Mexico ranks near the top in child hunger, the Republican budget lays the foundation for cuts to nutrition programs that help families put food on the table during difficult times.

"While I may not agree with every provision in each alternative Democratic budget, they all stand in stark contrast to the Republican plan by supporting hard-working families through investments in infrastructure, affordable college education, and growing paychecks."

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted today in support of the Medicare Access and CHIP Reauthorization Act, bipartisan legislation to protect seniors' access to doctors through Medicare.

"Year after year for more than a decade, Congress has passed short-term fixes to a flawed system in order to prevent seniors on Medicare from losing access to the doctors they trust. Time and again, rather than enacting a stable payment system for doctors, Congress has kicked the can down the road. Finally, a bipartisan effort has led to a compromise to permanently ensure seniors' can continue to see their doctor.

NM DELEGATION RESPONDS TO REPORT BY WIPP TECHNICAL ASSESSMENT TEAM; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 259 words

WASHINGTON - Today, U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce and Ben Ray Lujan issued the following joint statement on the report by the U.S. Department of Energy's (DOE) Technical Assessment Team, analyzing the scientific cause of the drum failure that led to the Feb. 14, 2014, radiological incident at the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant (WIPP).

"Today's report answers some of the questions about what led to the radiological release at WIPP on Feb. 14, 2014. We thank the scientists, including experts from Sandia Labs, for their work, which was done in coordination with the analysis by DOE's Accident Investigation Board.

"The Technical Assessment Team concluded that the release was caused by a chemical reaction with some incompatible materials that were added to one specific drum. We look forward to reviewing the recommendations of the Accident Investigation Board report in the coming weeks. Similarly, New Mexico Tech will soon begin a peer review of the Technical Assessment Team work, which will provide an independent second look at the science and causes of the release. The multiple layers of assessment are another step in the process of reopening WIPP and ensuring the continued safety of both WIPP and Los Alamos National Lab.

"In the meantime, we will continue doing everything we can to ensure resources are available to resume cleanup at Los Alamos and safely reopen WIPP."

N.M. Delegation Encourages Department of Defense to Support UNM's Proposal to Create National Institute of Photonics

LENGTH: 563 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Martin Heinrich, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Today, U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham announced that they are urging the Department of Defense to select a proposal led by a team that includes the University of New Mexico in a competition to create a national photonics hub. The team, a collaboration of academic institutions from New Mexico and three other states, was named a finalist earlier this year. If selected, it will receive federal funding and support and become part of a network of regional manufacturing institutes or "hubs" across the country that help bridge the gap between applied research and product development. The hub would spur the development of cutting-edge technology and create high-tech jobs in the Albuquerque area.

The New Mexico congressional delegation has strongly supported the UNM team's application, which would establish the first such manufacturing hub west of the Mississippi as part of the Integrated Photonics Institute for Manufacturing Innovation (IP-IMI) program. Photonics technologies are used in robotics, medical imaging, next-generation displays, defense, biometric security and many other fields. The group could receive $110 million in federal grant matching funds to develop a partnership between industry, government and academia to accelerate the creation of new photonics technologies. UNM would serve as the lead sensing hub, focusing on the development of integrated phonic sensors for chem-bio sensing.

In a letter to Secretary of Defense Ashton Carter, all five members of New Mexico's congressional delegation expressed their strong support for the proposal.

"This team will bring together government, industry and academia to develop this manufacturing ecosystem here in the U.S. They have broad talents and proven track records in microelectronics and chip packaging, as well as significant expertise in world-class photonics manufacturing," the letter reads. "New Mexico's unique capabilities in Mid Infrared photonic systems have served our DOD and commercial industries for decades. UNM will stand up the New Mexico Hub on Sensing-Integrated Manufacturing for Mid-infrared Photonic Applications Technology (IMMPACT) which will work toward self-sufficiency."

"The U.S. photonics industry currently supports more than 100,000 high-paying jobs, a number that could double within the next decade as new photonic-electronic chips find their way into products and technologies across many industries," the letter continues. "The combined team's established research and development in critical areas of this technology, coupled with its electronics and photonics packaging expertise, will build a pipeline of innovation and talent for this high-tech industry."

The UNM team is led by the Information Science Institute at the University of Southern California and also includes the University of California system schools in Los Angeles, San Diego and Berkeley; Arizona State University; and Ohio State University. The team is competing against two others based in New York and Florida. Full and final applications are due by March 31, and the final selection is expected in June 2015.

LUJAN STATEMENT ON THE DEATH OF MAYOR GEORGE GONZALES; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 232 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement on the death of former Santa Fe Mayor George Gonzales, who passed away last night.

"Last night we lost a great New Mexico leader from the Santa Fe community whose contributions extended from his efforts in City Hall to his daily work on the airwaves. George Gonzales loved Santa Fe and its people and sought to build a stronger community through his passion for service and music.

"Beginning in his early years as a singer-songwriter, his deep interest in music guided him through life, leading him to own local Santa Fe radio stations. His familiar voice informed, uplifted, and enriched all those who tuned in to listen to his daily messages celebrating a birthday, an anniversary, or the memory of lost loved one.

"George Gonzales' love to help people was only exceeded by his love for his family. While we say goodbye to Mr. Gonzales, his legacy lives on in his children who have followed in his footsteps. Mr. Gonzales will be greatly missed, but their good work ensures that his memory lives on. My thoughts and prayers are with the Gonzales family during this sad time, and on behalf of the Lujan family, I express our sincere condolences for their loss."

LUJAN: HOUSE REPUBLICAN BUDGET STANDS IN STARK CONTRAST TO DEMOCRATS' EFFORTS TO SUPPORT HARD-WORKING FAMILIES;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 291 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting against House Republicans' budget for Fiscal Year 2016.

"A budget is a statement of values, and the contrast between the House Republican budget that puts special interests first and the House Democratic budget that invests in growing the middle class could not be clearer. House Republicans provide tax breaks to billionaires, yet shortchange investments in early education that are vital to our children's future and infrastructure that are essential to putting more New Mexicans to work. House Democrats invest in job training programs, education at every level, and clean energy - critical components for strengthening our nation's competitiveness and building a stronger economy that creates more jobs and opportunities for the people of New Mexico.

"Once again, House Republicans call for the end of Medicare as we know it by replacing it with a voucher that fails to cover the cost of health care for New Mexico's seniors, leaving them to pay higher out-of-pocket costs. At a time when New Mexico ranks near the top in child hunger, the Republican budget lays the foundation for cuts to nutrition programs that help families put food on the table during difficult times.

"While I may not agree with every provision in each alternative Democratic budget, they all stand in stark contrast to the Republican plan by supporting hard-working families through investments in infrastructure, affordable college education, and growing paychecks."

LUJAN: VA CHANGE TO 40-MILE RULE A COMMONSENSE STEP FORWARD TO BETTER MEET THE NEEDS OF NEW MEXICO VETERANS;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 279 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted a recent decision by the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) to modify a rule that determines eligibility for the Veterans Choice Program. Under the current version, veterans are eligible to seek care for a doctor outside the VA system if they are more than 40 miles away from a VA facility "as the crow flies." The announced change will measure driving distance, enabling more veterans to receive care closer to home.

"In rural communities across New Mexico, veterans have had to travel great distances to receive the care they have earned with their brave service. Under the Veterans Choice Program, Congress took an important step to make it easier for them to receive care closer to their own communities," Congressman Lujan said. "As we know in New Mexico, the path between two points is not always a straight line; it's through mountain passes and valleys. The announced change to this rule is a commonsense step to reflect the realities we face in rural communities, to better meet the needs of New Mexico's veterans and to better follow the intent of the law."

The Veterans Choice Program was created as part of the Veterans' Access to Care through Choice, Accountability, and Transparency Act, which passed with Lujan's support last July. The law provides key funding to reduce the VA backlog, hire new medical personnel at VA hospitals and clinics, and allow the VA to lease new medical facilities.

N.M. Delegation Encourages Department of Defense to Support UNM's Proposal to Create National Institute of Photonics; Initiative will create jobs, build on N.M.'s unique expertise in optics and photonics, delegation says in letter to Defense Secretary;
Sen. Tom Udall (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. SENATE DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 1138 words

WASHINGTON - Today, U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham announced that they are urging the Department of Defense to select a proposal led by a team that includes the University of New Mexico in a competition to create a national photonics hub. The team, a collaboration of academic institutions from New Mexico and three other states, was named a finalist earlier this year. If selected, it will receive federal funding and support and become part of a network of regional manufacturing institutes or "hubs" across the country that help bridge the gap between applied research and product development. The hub would spur the development of cutting-edge technology and create high-tech jobs in the Albuquerque area.

The New Mexico congressional delegation has strongly supported the UNM team's application, which would establish the first such manufacturing hub west of the Mississippi as part of the Integrated Photonics Institute for Manufacturing Innovation (IP-IMI) program. Photonics technologies are used in robotics, medical imaging, next-generation displays, defense, biometric security and many other fields. The group could receive $110 million in federal grant matching funds to develop a partnership between industry, government and academia to accelerate the creation of new photonics technologies. UNM would serve as the lead sensing hub, focusing on the development of integrated phonic sensors for chem-bio sensing.

In a letter to Secretary of Defense Ashton Carter, all five members of New Mexico's congressional delegation expressed their strong support for the proposal.

"This team will bring together government, industry and academia to develop this manufacturing ecosystem here in the U.S. They have broad talents and proven track records in microelectronics and chip packaging, as well as significant expertise in world-class photonics manufacturing," the letter reads. "New Mexico's unique capabilities in Mid Infrared photonic systems have served our DOD and commercial industries for decades. UNM will stand up the New Mexico Hub on Sensing-Integrated Manufacturing for Mid-infrared Photonic Applications Technology (IMMPACT) which will work toward self-sufficiency."

"The U.S. photonics industry currently supports more than 100,000 high-paying jobs, a number that could double within the next decade as new photonic-electronic chips find their way into products and technologies across many industries," the letter continues. "The combined team's established research and development in critical areas of this technology, coupled with its electronics and photonics packaging expertise, will build a pipeline of innovation and talent for this high-tech industry."

The UNM team is led by the Information Science Institute at the University of Southern California and also includes the University of California system schools in Los Angeles, San Diego and Berkeley; Arizona State University; and Ohio State University. The team is competing against two others based in New York and Florida. Full and final applications are due by March 31, and the final selection is expected in June 2015.

The full text of the letter is HERE https://www.scribd.com/doc/259949086/N-M-Delegation-Encourages-Department-of-Defense-to-Support-UNM-s-Proposal-to-Create-National-Institute-of-Photonics and below:

The Honorable Ashton B. Carter

Secretary

U.S. Department of Defense

1000 Defense Pentagon

Washington, DC 20301

Dear Secretary Carter:

We are writing to express our strong support for the proposal submitted by the University of Southern California's (USC) Information Sciences Institute (ISI) Team to establish a new Integrated Photonics Institute for Manufacturing Innovation (IP-IMI).

USC ISI and its partners at University of New Mexico (UNM), the University of California-Los Angeles (UCLA), the University of California-Berkeley (UCB), the University of California-San Diego (UCSD), Arizona State University, and the Ohio State University, as well as numerous industry partners, will establish a reliable photonics manufacturing capability to serve both our Department of Defense (DOD) and commercial markets. Ultimately, the USC IP-IMI will be an end-to-end integrated photonics manufacturing "ecosystem."

This team will bring together government, industry and academia to develop this manufacturing ecosystem here in the U.S. They have broad talents and proven track records in microelectronics and chip packaging, as well as significant expertise in world-class photonics manufacturing. They also can leverage complementary expertise in serving commercial and DOD industries, a key to the success of the IP-IMI initiative. New Mexico's unique capabilities in Mid Infrared photonic systems have served our DOD and commercial industries for decades. UNM will stand up the New Mexico Hub on Sensing - Integrated Manufacturing for Mid-infrared Photonic Applications Technology (IMMPACT) which will work toward self-sufficiency.

New Mexico has a long history of innovation and collaboration in the development and deployment of DOD technologies, as well as Department of Energy (DOE) programs. Our state is home to Sandia National Laboratories, Los Alamos National Laboratory, and the Air Force Research Laboratory (AFRL). We have nationally-recognized programs in workforce education and training at the UNM and Central New Mexico Community College. UNM, Sandia, Los Alamos and AFRL also have strong relations with a wide network of small to medium sized manufacturers, as well as the major industrial companies involved in photonics research and applications. New Mexico also has the New Mexico Optics Industry Association (nmOptics), a non-profit association recognized by the International Society for Optics and Photonics (SPIE) as an industry leader which promotes the growth of the optics and photonics industry in our state.

The U.S. photonics industry currently supports more than 100,000 high-paying jobs, a number that could double within the next decade as new photonic-electronic chips find their way into products and technologies across many industries. The combined team's established research and development in critical areas of this technology, coupled with its electronics and photonics packaging expertise, will build a pipeline of innovation and talent for this high-tech industry.

We believe that the USC ISI proposal has merit, and we urge you to give it thoughtful consideration. Thank you for your attention to this request.

Sincerely,

Tom Udall, United States Senator

Martin Heinrich, United States Senator

Stevan Pearce, United States Representative

Ben Ray Lujan, United States Representative

Michelle Lujan Grisham, United States Representative

Lujan Statement on Fifth Anniversary of the Affordable Care Act

LENGTH: 250 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on the fifth anniversary of the Affordable Care Act being signed into law.

"The Affordable Care Act is working, and it is having a real impact on the lives of the people of New Mexico. For too long, New Mexico has ranked high on the list of the uninsured. As a result of the Affordable Care Act, the number of uninsured New Mexicans has started to fall, decreasing by nearly 5 percent. This means that thousands of families are no longer one accident or illness away from financial ruin.

"Five years after the ACA was signed into law, more than 16 million Americans who did not have health coverage now do. In addition, 129 million Americans have the peace of mind of knowing that they will not be dropped from their plan or discriminated against because of a pre-existing condition. Seniors are saving money on their prescription medicine, women can no longer be charged more just for being a woman, and no New Mexican has to fear hitting a lifetime limit on their health coverage.

"Moving forward, Congress should work in a bipartisan effort to strengthen the law and make improvements that will further lower costs and increase access to care for New Mexicans and the American people."

Transcript of Pelosi, Luján Press Conference Today After Tour of Santa Fe Community College

LENGTH: 1300 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the House of Representative Nancy Pelosi, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Congressman Ben Ray Luján held a press conference today following a tour of Santa Fe Community College. Below is a transcript of the Leader's opening remarks, as well as a question and answer session:

Leader Pelosi's Opening Remarks:

"Thank you all very much. Thank you very much, we call him 'Mr. Chairman,' Ben Ray Luján, in Washington, D.C. It is an honor to be here with you always, once again. I think the last time we came together it was about 'When Women Succeed, America Succeeds,' and that's still part of our theme.

[Applause]

"Mr. President, President Grissom, thank you for your great leadership here at Santa Fe Community College. And yes, if my coming here brings rain - any excuse will do for me to come to Santa Fe, or to come to New Mexico, the 'Land of Enchantment' - aptly named. So whether it's for weather or whatever, I'm happy to come. Kathy, thank you for your wonderful words about Mr. Ben Ray Luján. I know how respected he is in the community here. I want you to know how respected he is in the Congress. It's especially wonderful to be here with his mother, Carmen. And one thing he didn't say about Speaker Luján introducing the bill, passing the bill to establish Santa Fe Community College is that it won by one vote. It took leadership. It took courage, and he got the job done. Thank you to the Luján family for that, and for so many other things.

[Applause]

"It's clear, listening to August - what more can anyone say, what better testimonial to an institution than to hear a student speak to it in such a beautiful way. It's clear also, that although he may be the first in his family to receive a college degree, [with] what he brings to this institution, it's clear that there were others who went before him in his family who clearly could have had that opportunity. And if it's a financial consideration, that's really harmful - not only to the individuals, but to our country. So how do we pay for all of this? I'll get to that in a moment.

"But first, I want to thank all of you for sending Ben Ray to the Congress. Again, as a Member of the Energy and Commerce Committee, he's just a spectacular voice for the future, for innovation, for entrepreneurship, for everything you do here. His legislative agenda is one that is in furtherance of all of that. The respect he commands there - he's a no-nonsense guy. If he's suggesting it, people listen, and they take heed, and they help him - in a non-partisan way I might add, in that regard. I intended to come up here and talk to you about what I saw today. But I really want to enlarge it for a moment, to say - beyond the technicalities of what I saw today, because I would surely demonstrate my limitations doing that. It was so spectacular, so new, so wonderful. But what I also saw was a spirit of what the President said. President Obama said this, and I'm going to tell him when we go home what we saw here - not home, home is where we live, Washington is where we work - so when we go there again.

"President Obama said: 'Community colleges are the unsung heroes of the nation's education system, providing a gateway for millions of Americans to good jobs and a better life.' What institution demonstrates that better than Santa Fe Community College, so beautifully? And that is in the context of when we talk about our budget, which we are debating right now in the Congress, being a statement of values. It's important to remember that nothing brings more money to the Treasury than the education of the American people, whether it's early childhood education - which President Grissom showed me is happening right here on this campus - earliest childhood, or k-12, higher education, post-grad, an important part of it, lifetime learning. All of that is happening - so much of that is happening on this campus. It's the best investment a family can make in its children and its family members - sometimes it's not just the children; it's parents going back, and I know you have a large number of older people on the campus, probably in their late 20s or something like that.

[Laughter]

"Nonetheless, and it is in fact how to keep America number one. It's not just about the aspirations - but that would be justification enough, because that is so fundamental to our democracy, that we have education available to all Americans. But it is how we keep America number one. Clearly, from what August has said, innovation begins in the classroom. And here, you see a classroom that has facilities, whether it was welding, everything that we saw today, which has already been reviewed. What's important about it all is that this is really a model to the country, and I can go back and say all the things we argued for in the budget - they really are working. They really are working. And here's one place where they're working in such a forward way - transformational, I would say. "And it is also a situation where entrepreneurship springs from it, and that entrepreneurship is really the lifeblood of our economy. And it's a place where veterans - Cheney, it's such a joy to see you here, where Cheney, where veterans find a place to make their contribution and the rest, and enrich the student body by their presence. Thank you, Santa Fe Community College, for opening that door to our veterans. Thank you, Cheney, for your service to our country.

[Applause]

"The thing about all of this, whether it's in the private sector, in business - we saw Caterpillar, I don't know if Caterpillar is still - but other private sector entities saying how they would be hiring some of the students who are trained here by showing what they need in the private sector. But in any event, whether it's private sector or educational institutions or whatever it is - talent attracts capital, capital provides the facilities, facilities attract talent. It's just this circle. So having a model like this that shows - with the ingenuity - Cheney was telling me they built the greenhouse from a kit, and then it has enabled all of this other science to emerge. Eric described [it] to us.

"So it is a remarkable connection - all of it that is happening here. That the connection to the Luján family is such a clear one is almost an emotional experience for me, but the fact that he will be able to take all of that back. Now, there's something you should know about Ben Ray that you may not have talked about before. Since you may have seen him, he is now a part of the Democratic Leadership of the House of Representatives. He is the chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. He is in the leadership because he commands so much respect from our Members, for all the reasons that you know and that we talked about earlier.

"He talked about middle class economics, to lift up the people of our country - not only the middle class, but those who aspire to it. Community colleges are an essential part of that. So Ben Ray - leadership, education, entrepreneurship, honoring our veterans, innovation - it's all connected, and to do it recognizing the beautiful diversity of America. We couldn't be better served or better led than by Ben Ray Luján. So I thank you for sending him here. And I thank you, Mr. President, for all that you are doing here. It's so remarkable. I've seen things that are transformational. I can't wait to go back to tell our colleagues about it, and hopefully raise the capital to help continue this. But thank you for being a model for the nation. I'm proud to be here with you."

[Applause]

"It's clear, listening to August - what more can anyone say, what better testimonial to an institution than to hear a student speak to it in such a beautiful way. It's clear also, that although he may be the first in his family to receive a college degree, [with] what he brings to this institution, it's clear that there were others who went before him in his family who clearly could have had that opportunity. And if it's a financial consideration, that's really harmful - not only to the individuals, but to our country. So how do we pay for all of this? I'll get to that in a moment.

"But first, I want to thank all of you for sending Ben Ray to the Congress. Again, as a Member of the Energy and Commerce Committee, he's just a spectacular voice for the future, for innovation, for entrepreneurship, for everything you do here. His legislative agenda is one that is in furtherance of all of that. The respect he commands there - he's a no-nonsense guy. If he's suggesting it, people listen, and they take heed, and they help him - in a non-partisan way I might add, in that regard. I intended to come up here and talk to you about what I saw today. But I really want to enlarge it for a moment, to say - beyond the technicalities of what I saw today, because I would surely demonstrate my limitations doing that. It was so spectacular, so new, so wonderful. But what I also saw was a spirit of what the President said. President Obama said this, and I'm going to tell him when we go home what we saw here - not home, home is where we live, Washington is where we work - so when we go there again.

"President Obama said: 'Community colleges are the unsung heroes of the nation's education system, providing a gateway for millions of Americans to good jobs and a better life.' What institution demonstrates that better than Santa Fe Community College, so beautifully? And that is in the context of when we talk about our budget, which we are debating right now in the Congress, being a statement of values. It's important to remember that nothing brings more money to the Treasury than the education of the American people, whether it's early childhood education - which President Grissom showed me is happening right here on this campus - earliest childhood, or k-12, higher education, post-grad, an important part of it, lifetime learning. All of that is happening - so much of that is happening on this campus. It's the best investment a family can make in its children and its family members - sometimes it's not just the children; it's parents going back, and I know you have a large number of older people on the campus, probably in their late 20s or something like that.

"Nonetheless, and it is in fact how to keep America number one. It's not just about the aspirations - but that would be justification enough, because that is so fundamental to our democracy, that we have education available to all Americans. But it is how we keep America number one. Clearly, from what August has said, innovation begins in the classroom. And here, you see a classroom that has facilities, whether it was welding, everything that we saw today, which has already been reviewed. What's important about it all is that this is really a model to the country, and I can go back and say all the things we argued for in the budget - they really are working. They really are working. And here's one place where they're working in such a forward way - transformational, I would say.
"And it is also a situation where entrepreneurship springs from it, and that entrepreneurship is really the lifeblood of our economy. And it's a place where veterans - Cheney, it's such a joy to see you here, where Cheney, where veterans find a place to make their contribution and the rest, and enrich the student body by their presence. Thank you, Santa Fe Community College, for opening that door to our veterans. Thank you, Cheney, for your service to our country.

[Applause]

"The thing about all of this, whether it's in the private sector, in business - we saw Caterpillar, I don't know if Caterpillar is still - but other private sector entities saying how they would be hiring some of the students who are trained here by showing what they need in the private sector. But in any event, whether it's private sector or educational institutions or whatever it is - talent attracts capital, capital provides the facilities, facilities attract talent. It's just this circle. So having a model like this that shows - with the ingenuity - Cheney was telling me they built the greenhouse from a kit, and then it has enabled all of this other science to emerge. Eric described [it] to us.

"So it is a remarkable connection - all of it that is happening here. That the connection to the Luján family is such a clear one is almost an emotional experience for me, but the fact that he will be able to take all of that back. Now, there's something you should know about Ben Ray that you may not have talked about before. Since you may have seen him, he is now a part of the Democratic Leadership of the House of Representatives. He is the chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. He is in the leadership because he commands so much respect from our Members, for all the reasons that you know and that we talked about earlier.

"He talked about middle class economics, to lift up the people of our country - not only the middle class, but those who aspire to it. Community colleges are an essential part of that. So Ben Ray - leadership, education, entrepreneurship, honoring our veterans, innovation - it's all connected, and to do it recognizing the beautiful diversity of America. We couldn't be better served or better led than by Ben Ray Luján. So I thank you for sending him here. And I thank you, Mr. President, for all that you are doing here. It's so remarkable. I've seen things that are transformational. I can't wait to go back to tell our colleagues about it, and hopefully raise the capital to help continue this. But thank you for being a model for the nation. I'm proud to be here with you."

LUJAN STATEMENT ON FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE AFFORDABLE CARE ACT;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 239 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on the fifth anniversary of the Affordable Care Act being signed into law.

"The Affordable Care Act is working, and it is having a real impact on the lives of the people of New Mexico. For too long, New Mexico has ranked high on the list of the uninsured. As a result of the Affordable Care Act, the number of uninsured New Mexicans has started to fall, decreasing by nearly 5 percent. This means that thousands of families are no longer one accident or illness away from financial ruin.

"Five years after the ACA was signed into law, more than 16 million Americans who did not have health coverage now do. In addition, 129 million Americans have the peace of mind of knowing that they will not be dropped from their plan or discriminated against because of a pre-existing condition. Seniors are saving money on their prescription medicine, women can no longer be charged more just for being a woman, and no New Mexican has to fear hitting a lifetime limit on their health coverage.

"Moving forward, Congress should work in a bipartisan effort to strengthen the law and make improvements that will further lower costs and increase access to care for New Mexicans and the American people."

Lujan: House Republican Budget Leaves Middle-Class Families Behind

LENGTH: 210 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on the House Republican budget.

"Once again House Republicans have introduced a budget that makes steep cuts to areas that are critical to growing the middle class and strengthening our economy, while dismantling Medicare as we know it for New Mexico's seniors. House Republicans provide tax breaks to special interests and billionaires, yet shortchange investments in early education that are vital to our children's future and infrastructure that are essential to putting more New Mexicans to work.

"House Republicans' plan takes away health care coverage for more than 16 million Americans, putting health insurance companies back in charge. With New Mexico near the top in child hunger, the Republican budget lays the foundation for cuts to nutrition programs that help families put food on the table during difficult times. The House Republican budget moves New Mexico and our nation down the wrong path, leaving middle-class families behind."

Lujan Announces Congressional Art Competition for High School Students

LENGTH: 745 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District announced today details for this year's Congressional Art Competition. This annual competition allows members of Congress to display the talent and creativity of their high school constituents. The winning entry from each Congressional district will be displayed as part of an exhibit in the United States Capitol for one year. The winner will travel to Washington, D.C. for a reception honoring the national winners.

"The Congressional Art Competition gives New Mexico's young artists the opportunity to display their fine work and share their talents on the national stage," Congressman Luján said. "I look forward to seeing the creative work from the next generation of artists who will continue in the rich artistic tradition that has long been a part of New Mexico's heritage and culture."

The competition is open to all high school students within the Third Congressional District of New Mexico. All entries must be submitted to Luján's Santa Fe district office by Tuesday, April 7, 2015 at 5 p.m. The winner will be announced at a reception on Saturday, April 11.

2015 3rd Congressional District of New Mexico General Guidelines for Students

A photo of each piece of artwork should be submitted with each piece of artwork (Rep. Luján's office will take a photo of the artwork if the student is unable to produce a photo for submission).
A completed 2015 Congressional Art Competition Student Information and Release Form (signed by a parent or guardian if the student is under the age of 18), must be submitted with each piece of artwork.
Winner need not be present at the reception to win.
Recognition will be given to the top placing pieces of artwork, with the winning piece being displayed in Washington, D.C.
Artwork must be submitted for review and judging by Tuesday, April 7, 2015 at 5 p.m. to the Santa Fe office of Rep. Luján.

Attn: Eliza Sultan
1611 Calle Lorca Suite A
Santa Fe, NM 87505
(505) 984-8950

2015 Congressional General Guidelines for Students

The competition is open to high school students only. Exception may be made for schools that have 7th through 12th grades on one campus.
Artwork must be two-dimensional.
Each piece can be no larger than 28"x28"x4" (28 inches high, 28 inches wide, and 4 inches deep), including the frame. Artwork can be submitted to Rep. Luján's office unframed. If the artwork is selected as the winning piece for display in D.C., it will be required to be framed and must adhere to the size guidelines. Rep.Luján's office will work with the winner to have the winning piece framed.
Framed artwork cannot weigh more than 15 lbs.
Accepted media for artwork are as follows:
o Paintings: oil, acrylics, watercolor, etc.
o Drawings: pastels, colored pencils, pencil, charcoal, ink, markers
o Collages: must be two dimensional
o Prints: lithographs, silkscreen, block prints
o Mixed Media: use of more than two mediums such as pencil, ink, watercolor, etc.
o Computer-Generated art
o Photographs
Each entry must be original in concept, design, and execution and may not violate U.S. copyright laws. Any entry that has been copied from an existing photo or image that was created by someone other than the student is a violation of the competition rules and will not be accepted.
Work entered must be in the original medium (that is, not a scanned reproduction of a painting or drawing).
Artwork will hang in the Capitol for the entire year of the exhibition and cannot be returned to the students earlier. Students should, therefore, submit artwork they will not need for other purposes.
Artwork must adhere to the policy of the House Office Building Commission. In accordance with this policy, exhibits depicting subjects of contemporary political controversy or a sensationalistic or gruesome nature are not allowed. It is necessary that all artwork be reviewed by the panel chaired by the Architect of the Capitol and any portion not in consonance with the Commission's policy will be omitted from the exhibit. The panel will make the final decision regarding the suitability of all artwork for the Congressional Art Competition exhibition in the Capitol.

The Santa Fe New Mexican (New Mexico)

Distributed by Tribune Content Agency

March 22, 2015 Sunday

EDITORIAL: No leadership? Squandered opportunity

BYLINE: The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: COMMENTARY

LENGTH: 617 words

March 22--Santa Fe Community College was in the spotlight Friday -- House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi was in town with U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján and they stopped by the college to visit. On the tour were programs in welding, agriculture and solar technology, all innovative and sustainable, each producing students ready to move on to a four-year college or go right to work.

The message was clear: Community colleges are incubators for economic growth. Graduates can find the kinds of jobs that keep families and individuals anchored firmly in the middle class.

There was an element of politics, of course, since Luján is now chairman of the Democratic Congressional Committee. He's charged with helping regain control of the U.S. House of Representatives for Democrats, and it is obvious that the need for job creation will be part of the attack.

The buzz words are set, too. The 2016 election, Democrats will argue, is about middle-class economics vs. trickle-down economics. Democrats will maintain that citizens will have better jobs, higher wages and an attainable path to success. Affordable education and accessible training are keys to those jobs materializing, which is one reason Pelosi and Luján were visiting SFCC.

For the college, it was an opportunity to show what it does so well, take students and provide opportunity. From there, graduates not only find jobs or pursue four-year degrees. They create businesses, learn to channel solar energy to heat and cool buildings, grow food using hydroponics technology -- in water, not soil -- in a greenhouse. More than 190 students are enrolled in these sustainable technologies, everything from green-building systems, greenhouse management, water treatment operation, biofuels, solar energy technology, even more prosaic but very necessary plumbing.

SFCC doesn't have a political point of view. Its job is to offer opportunity, something it has been doing for more than 30 years. (And, as students, faculty and staff at the tour were reminded Friday, the bill to establish the college was introduced in the Legislature in the 1980s by Luján's father, then-Rep. Ben Luján. It passed by one vote, showing how opportunity can stay unrealized without leadership.)

All this is in contrast to what just happened in Santa Fe, with the 60-day-long legislative session stumbling from start to finish. There was little focus (although lots of talk) on creating jobs or providing opportunity. Big ethics bills, for the most part, died along the way, as did important legislation to reduce interest rates on store-front loans and a long-overdue increase in the minimum wage. Grass-roots activists pushed back against legislation designed to give oil and gas companies free rein in counties where local zoning is more restrictive. But the capital outlay process was blown up, leaving communities in a bind.

Democrats in the Senate were left in the unenviable position of having to kill bad legislation; they did their job. One bright spot: Legislation to require better transparency in hospital costs, a project of Think New Mexico, did pass, with only the governor's signature necessary. And, yes, the $6.2 billion budget was approved. That's truly the one thing that has to get done.

By focusing on narrow, partisan bills -- many of which had failed in sessions past -- the GOP, from governor to new House leadership, ensured that not much of anything else was accomplished. Without leadership, opportunity is squandered. And that's exactly what happened in the 2015 legislative session.

Pelosi touts education on tour of Santa Fe college; Rep. Luján hosts minority leader

BYLINE: MARK OSWALD JOURNAL NORTH

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C1

LENGTH: 471 words

SANTA FE - U.S. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, in Santa Fe on Friday, fed some fish while promoting the role of community colleges.

She quoted President Barack Obama as saying the two-year schools are the "unsung heroes" in the American higher education system.

"Nothing brings more money to the Treasury than the education of the American people," Pelosi said after a tour of Santa Fe Community College's Trades and Advanced Technology Center.

"Talent attracts capital; capital provides the facilities; facilities attract talent," she said. "It's just a circle."

Pelosi lavished praise on what she saw at SFCC - including a hydroponics center where she fed and got splashed by frenzied tilapia. The California Democrat, ushered by U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., also checked out a welding program and solar energy innovations that can cool as well as heat buildings. Students and college staffers came in during spring break to show Luján and Pelosi around.

"What an important model for the country," she said of the center. "I can go back and say all the things we argue for in the budget, they really are working, and here's one place they're working in such a forward way - transformational, I would say."

Asked about Obama's recent proposal to make community colleges tuition-free for two years, Pelosi said making the plan a reality would be difficult.

"I don't want to turn this into a political conversation," she said, "but we have a fight about these kinds of things. You would think that a budget would be a statement of our national values - what's important to us as a country is where we should put our assets."

She added that without the "anvil" of college debt hanging over them, students have more choices and "can be entrepreneurial, they can take risks."

Pelosi and Luján, who was appointed chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in November, also discussed the DCCC's annual "issues conference" that Luján is hosting in Santa Fe this weekend.

Luján said participants would be talking about standing for "middle-class economics ahead of trickle-down economics," and both said that voting rights and access to the polls are on the agenda as the nation marks the 50th anniversary of Martin Luther King Jr.'s historic voting-rights march in Selma, Ala.

"The increased involvement of more people in the elective process is the most wholesome thing we can do for our country," Pelosi said, "but it also slams the use of big money in our politics, and that is what we have to do for our democracy."

She said the country needs to "have more people see the connection between their lives and the ballot box."

Pelosi had many good things to say about Luján, saying he's now known as "Mr. Chairman" in Washington and describing him as a "no-nonsense guy."

"If he's suggesting it, people listen," she said.

Luján shines spotlight on New Mexico; 150 big-name Democrats, donors meet this weekend in Santa Fe

LENGTH: 979 words

WASHINGTON - Rep. Ben Ray Luján is spending the weekend in Santa Fe, but it's far from an ordinary trip home for the northern New Mexico congressman. Luján, who was appointed chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in November, will be the master of ceremonies at the DCCC's annual "issues conference," based at La Posada de Santa Fe Resort and Spa, just off the Santa Fa plaza. The conference allows about 150 of the Democratic Party's big donors and national elected officials to rub elbows and swap ideas.

In recent years, the annual gathering has convened in other prestigious locales, such as Napa Valley and New York City. But thanks to Luján's DCCC chairmanship, it's Santa Fe's turn in the spotlight.

Luján will start his day today with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., at Santa Fe Community College, where they will tour the school, meet with the college president and talk about the importance of education in lifting people out of the poverty. Santa Fe Mayor Javier Gonzales said he will officially welcome the Democratic group at an event at the Center for Contemporary Arts tonight.

The conference itself is scheduled for Saturday at La Posada resort, according to an invitation obtained by the Journal. On Saturday night, conference attendees are invited to "Chairman Luján's Taste of Santa Fe," a party at the nationally renowned Gerald Peters Art Gallery.

Luján said he's proud to showcase his hometown.

"I wanted it to be held in Santa Fe because I wanted to show off New Mexico," Luján said, grinning ear to ear during a Journal interview this week in his office at the DCCC headquarters on Capitol Hill. "Anytime we can get people coming to Santa Fe, it's good for the local economy. I hope a lot of art is bought and restaurants visited."

In a statement provided to the Journal, Pelosi praised Luján, her handpicked leader of the 2016 Democraticcongressional campaign. The longtime Democratic power player said in November that she chose Luján because of his energy and "political astuteness." Political observers said Luján's Hispanic heritage likely also factored into Pelosi's decision as the Democratic Party seeks out candidates who appeal to the nation's fastest-growing ethnic group. Pelosi said Luján has "hit the ground running" in his first few months on the job.

"Chairman Luján has shown he has the energy and the dynamism to lead House Democrats to victory in 2016," Pelosi said in a statement provided to the Journal this week. "With Ben Ray's tireless determination, his values, and his deep strategic savvy, Democrats will continue to champion bigger paychecks and better infrastructure for hardworking Americans across the country."

Asked his priority as DCCC chairman, Luján was direct.

"My top goal is to put the House in play," he said, adding that he was routinely working 12- to 15-hour days to ensure he can attend to his regular duties as a congressman, as well as lead the DCCC.

Tall order

Recapturing the House in 2016 would seem to be a tall order, considering that Republicans now hold a 59-seat advantage in the House. With 247 seats over the Democrats' 188, the GOP has its largest majority since the 71st Congress, which convened from 1929 to 1931.

"Putting the House 'in play' is something the DCCC chair should try to do, but it isn't very realistic this cycle - at least not now," said Stu Rothenberg, a respected Washington political handicapper and author of the Rothenberg Political Report. "Things could change, of course, but 30 seats is a big number and the way districts are now drawn, there simply aren't that many great Democratic opportunities.

"In a big Democratic wave, 30 seats is possible," Rothenberg added. "But there are no signs of that now and presidential years generally don't generate big partisan waves the way midterm elections do."

In the fundraising contest, Luján - at least so far - is more than holding his own. In total, House Democrats raised $6.3 million in January, compared with House Republicans' total of $4.4 million. Luján set the pace personally, transferring $150,000 from his own campaign coffers to the DCCC's. A half-dozen other Democrats followed suit, shifting $100,000 each to the DCCC.

Ian Prior, spokesman for the Republican National Congressional Committee, said Luján has had trouble recruiting legitimate candidates early in his term and been embarrassed by slip-ups, including an erroneous fundraising email claiming that House Republicans had allowed the Department of Homeland Security to be shut down. Although the DHS funding battle went to the brink, the agency was never closed.

"Thus far into his term as DCCC Chairman, Ben Ray Luján has been unable to recruit legitimate candidates in several competitive House seats, making his delusional predictions of Democrats retaking the House all the more laughable," Prior said. "Meanwhile, the organization he leads has even been blasted by liberals for its questionable tactics and it has embarrassed itself repeatedly with unforced errors, like sending out fundraising emails erroneously claiming that the Department of Homeland Security had been shut down."

Meanwhile, Santa Fe Mayor Gonzales said he's excited to see his old friend Luján returning home as a national political figure. Gonzales also said he expects the Democrats to talk about income disparity - a reality they can witness for themselves in New Mexico's capital city.

"For all of the incredible cultural assets we have in Santa Fe that are globally recognized, we still have many families that are earning below poverty wages and a lot of our children - at least a third of them - go to school hungry every day or count on our schools to be fed," Gonzales said. "We have many families who continue to struggle every day to support their kids and be a part of the middle class, so it's fitting that they're here and they can see it."

TRANSCRIPT OF PELOSI, LUJAN PRESS CONFERENCE TODAY AFTER TOUR OF SANTA FE COMMUNITY COLLEGE

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 2891 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi:

Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Congressman Ben Ray Lujan held a press conference today following a tour of Santa Fe Community College. Below is a transcript of the Leader's opening remarks, as well as a question and answer session:

Leader Pelosi's Opening Remarks :

"Thank you all very much. Thank you very much, we call him "Mr. Chairman,' Ben Ray Lujan, in Washington, D.C. It is an honor to be here with you always, once again. I think the last time we came together it was about "When Women Succeed, America Succeeds,' and that's still part of our theme.

[Applause]

"Mr. President, President Grissom, thank you for your great leadership here at Santa Fe Community College. And yes, if my coming here brings rain - any excuse will do for me to come to Santa Fe, or to come to New Mexico, the "Land of Enchantment' - aptly named. So whether it's for weather or whatever, I'm happy to come. Kathy, thank you for your wonderful words about Mr. Ben Ray Lujan. I know how respected he is in the community here. I want you to know how respected he is in the Congress. It's especially wonderful to be here with his mother, Carmen. And one thing he didn't say about Speaker Lujan introducing the bill, passing the bill to establish Santa Fe Community College is that it won by one vote. It took leadership. It took courage, and he got the job done. Thank you to the Lujan family for that, and for so many other things.

[Applause]

"It's clear, listening to August - what more can anyone say, what better testimonial to an institution than to hear a student speak to it in such a beautiful way. It's clear also, that although he may be the first in his family to receive a college degree, [with] what he brings to this institution, it's clear that there were others who went before him in his family who clearly could have had that opportunity. And if it's a financial consideration, that's really harmful - not only to the individuals, but to our country. So how do we pay for all of this? I'll get to that in a moment.

"But first, I want to thank all of you for sending Ben Ray to the Congress. Again, as a Member of the Energy and Commerce Committee, he's just a spectacular voice for the future, for innovation, for entrepreneurship, for everything you do here. His legislative agenda is one that is in furtherance of all of that. The respect he commands there - he's a no-nonsense guy. If he's suggesting it, people listen, and they take heed, and they help him - in a non-partisan way I might add, in that regard. I intended to come up here and talk to you about what I saw today. But I really want to enlarge it for a moment, to say - beyond the technicalities of what I saw today, because I would surely demonstrate my limitations doing that. It was so spectacular, so new, so wonderful. But what I also saw was a spirit of what the President said. President Obama said this, and I'm going to tell him when we go home what we saw here - not home, home is where we live, Washington is where we work - so when we go there again.

"President Obama said: "Community colleges are the unsung heroes of the nation's education system, providing a gateway for millions of Americans to good jobs and a better life.' What institution demonstrates that better than Santa Fe Community College, so beautifully? And that is in the context of when we talk about our budget, which we are debating right now in the Congress, being a statement of values. It's important to remember that nothing brings more money to the Treasury than the education of the American people, whether it's early childhood education - which President Grissom showed me is happening right here on this campus - earliest childhood, or k-12, higher education, post-grad, an important part of it, lifetime learning. All of that is happening - so much of that is happening on this campus. It's the best investment a family can make in its children and its family members - sometimes it's not just the children; it's parents going back, and I know you have a large number of older people on the campus, probably in their late 20s or something like that.

"Nonetheless, and it is in fact how to keep America number one. It's not just about the aspirations - but that would be justification enough, because that is so fundamental to our democracy, that we have education available to all Americans. But it is how we keep America number one. Clearly, from what August has said, innovation begins in the classroom. And here, you see a classroom that has facilities, whether it was welding, everything that we saw today, which has already been reviewed. What's important about it all is that this is really a model to the country, and I can go back and say all the things we argued for in the budget - they really are working. They really are working. And here's one place where they're working in such a forward way - transformational, I would say.

"And it is also a situation where entrepreneurship springs from it, and that entrepreneurship is really the lifeblood of our economy. And it's a place where veterans - Cheney, it's such a joy to see you here, where Cheney, where veterans find a place to make their contribution and the rest, and enrich the student body by their presence. Thank you, Santa Fe Community College, for opening that door to our veterans. Thank you, Cheney, for your service to our country.

[Applause]

"The thing about all of this, whether it's in the private sector, in business - we saw Caterpillar, I don't know if Caterpillar is still - but other private sector entities saying how they would be hiring some of the students who are trained here by showing what they need in the private sector. But in any event, whether it's private sector or educational institutions or whatever it is - talent attracts capital, capital provides the facilities, facilities attract talent. It's just this circle. So having a model like this that shows - with the ingenuity - Cheney was telling me they built the greenhouse from a kit, and then it has enabled all of this other science to emerge. Eric described [it] to us.

"So it is a remarkable connection - all of it that is happening here. That the connection to the Lujan family is such a clear one is almost an emotional experience for me, but the fact that he will be able to take all of that back. Now, there's something you should know about Ben Ray that you may not have talked about before. Since you may have seen him, he is now a part of the Democratic Leadership of the House of Representatives. He is the chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. He is in the leadership because he commands so much respect from our Members, for all the reasons that you know and that we talked about earlier.

"He talked about middle class economics, to lift up the people of our country - not only the middle class, but those who aspire to it. Community colleges are an essential part of that. So Ben Ray - leadership, education, entrepreneurship, honoring our veterans, innovation - it's all connected, and to do it recognizing the beautiful diversity of America. We couldn't be better served or better led than by Ben Ray Lujan. So I thank you for sending him here. And I thank you, Mr. President, for all that you are doing here. It's so remarkable. I've seen things that are transformational. I can't wait to go back to tell our colleagues about it, and hopefully raise the capital to help continue this. But thank you for being a model for the nation. I'm proud to be here with you."

Q: How did you get Leader Pelosi to come out here, or is this part of a bigger trip?

Congressman Lujan. Well, so - we just asked.

[Laughter]

We were fortunate that the Leader was willing to come out to New Mexico. And we're also here - we have people from around the United States that have come to New Mexico this weekend so that we can talk about the path forward, making sure we're talking about the middle class economics around the United States, that it's a staple of what we're talking about around the dinner table.

And look, middle class economics is about putting milk in the refrigerator, milk, eggs, maybe saving a little bit of money at the end of the month to help get your friends through college and making sure that's really a staple of what we're talking about across America, especially with the family that I grew up in.

But I'll tell you, the Leader has just been extraordinary in making sure that we're able to get to all parts of the United States. And we're very fortunate to have her here in New Mexico this week.

Leader Pelosi. I can't even count how many times I have been to New Mexico over the years. Maybe I'll go back and try to figure it out. But any invitation I accept and initiate some of my own - whether it's personally, politically, or officially - to come here. It's such a wonderful place, and clearly, what I came here and saw today was the future.

Q: Can you tell us a bit more about this meeting taking place this weekend, who's participating and how it's working?

Congressman Lujan. Well again, we have guests from around the country. We have Members of Congress that will be coming to visit on different topics. But middle class economics will be center stage. I'm sure that we're going to be talking about, as well, the Voting Rights Act, the 50th anniversary of Selma. I had the honor of being with the Leader and John Lewis, Jim Clyburn, for the commemoration.

Leader Pelosi. President Obama.

Congressman Lujan. And President Obama - what amazing words that he shared. I think the Leader captures the sentiment that she shares with so many across the United States with words that were shared that day as well. And it's centering around how we can how we can make sure we're moving together, to stand together for all of the working people all across America to make the country stronger - again, putting middle class economics ahead of trickle-down economics.

Leader Pelosi. If I just may add to that, I'm excited about all of it because it's connected - fairness in our economy, middle class economics versus trickle-down economics. But the voting rights piece of this is a very central piece for the following reason: it's the 50th anniversary, you all know that. The crossing of the bridge in Selma - the Edmund Pettus Bridge - was a bridge to the ballot. Leading up to that time, Rev. Martin Luther King always talked about the ballot, the ballot, the ballot being the path to legislation to improve the lives of people, to make the middle class stronger, and pull more people up into the middle class - the ballot, the ballot, the ballot.

This 50th anniversary gives us the opportunity - under the leadership of not only our Chairman, Mr. Ben Ray Lujan - but also Mr. Clyburn who's going to be here, and John Lewis who's going to be here, and Barbara Lee will have a conference or seminar or whatever this evening on this subject because only one-third of the electorate voted in the last election and there has to be a way for us to say to people: "This is why this is important in your lives. Decisions that are made at the legislative table affect you." Walter Reuther said the bread box and the ballot box cannot be separated. If you win at the negotiating table, what you win there can be removed by elections and those who do not share the views about America's working families.

But it's really important for another reason, and that is: the increased involvement of more people in the electoral process is the most wholesome thing we can do for our country, but it also slams the use of big money in politics. And that is what we have to do for our democracy: empower people more, have more people see the connection between their lives, the ballot box, and decisions that are made after as well as reducing the role of money - reducing the skepticism that the American people have about how strong their voices are in the political process.

Ben Ray Lujan is the perfect person to bring all of that together - his commitment to middle class economics, his appreciation for expanding the vote to many more people, and again, his effectiveness in getting the job done. So thank you for planning this conference.

Q: Is the idea of fully-subsided community college for the first two years ...

Leader Pelosi. It's hard. You know, that is the President's proposal and it is something that should happen. I don't want to turn this into a political conversation but we have a fight about these kind of things. You would think that a budget would be a statement of our national values. What is important to us as a country should be where we put our assets. And by the way - I harken back to what I said before - nothing reduces the deficit more, because it brings more money to the treasury, than the education of the American people. So the investment in community colleges and reducing the cost - but what Ben Ray Lujan said was true about what we did but much of that has expired, and what we're trying to do is renew it. And the fight that we have in the battle of the budget is a reduction in commitment to Pell Grants - they want to freeze the amount of money for Pell Grants for 10 years thereby limiting the number of people who could access a Pell Grant and also how much money the Pell Grant will be for a family. Sometimes that difference makes that difference of a person going to higher education or not.

So, we think the two-year [community college plan] is the most logical thing that you can do. It may happen in some states before it happens nationally because of the battle of the budget that we have there, but again, it saves money as do Pell Grants, as does reducing the costs of student loans. And Ben Ray referred to it: it frees people, liberates people if they don't have this anvil - I call it the anvil of student debt - this anvil of student debt so that they can be entrepreneurial, they can take risks. August talked about discovery and invention and that entrepreneurial spirit that he has. If a student has all of that and massive debt, they have to make choices that are quite different than if they didn't. And as I say as a mother of five children: they might even get married.

[Laughter]

Take risks. Go out there. What could be more of a risk than starting a small business? It requires more optimism than maybe getting married. But it any event, it frees them to have choices and options - what we want the American people to have.

Congressman Lujan. Thank you. We have time for one more.

Q: [Inaudible]

Leader Pelosi. The question is: can I speak more about the role of women and girls in growing the economy, expanding the economy.

Yes. When I was - well, I don't know if it was the last time, but a recent time when I was in New Mexico, we talked about "When Women Succeed, America Succeeds' which really is very important for our economy to understand that. Other countries do. The Prime Minister of Japan was in Davos last year. They asked: "How are you going to turn your economy around?" He said, "The involvement of women in our economy." The President of Colombia was in my office. He said: "We have a secret to grow our economy." I said: "Will you share it with us?" He said: "The involvement of women in our economy."

It's really so important. But for it to happen, we have to recognize that some changes have to happen. We have to have affordable, quality child care; we have to have paid sick leave; we have to have equal pay for equal work so that women can really thrive in the economy. But you can't say: "Our country is going to grow and be great but we're going to limit the involvement of half the people in our country," and expect that. Now it doesn't mean women are smarter or better or anything, it just means the beauty is in the mix. Having women at the table is very important. And I would extend that to women and minorities at the table. That's our country. That decision-making should happen with a full participation.

But we know - we have the facts, the figures, the data, the analysis and all the rest of it - if you involve women at every level - whether it's in the military training, whether it's in the academic world, whether it's in corporate America - the more women in leadership, the better. And of course, when it comes to government and politics, the most wholesome thing that we can do is to have more women appointed, elected, and not only having a seat at the table but having a seat at the head of the table.

And that's why I'm so proud that in our Caucus, we are a majority of women, minorities, and LGBT community folks. That's our Caucus - it's a majority of that beautiful mix, "A'. "B', not only there, but in our leadership, the people who would be chairs - in other words, when Ben Ray leads us to victory - those Ranking Members will be Chairs. The majority of people who would be Chairs are women, minorities, LGBT. So it's a pretty exciting thing because, again, not only a seat at the table, but a seat at the head of the table. And leading us all in all that is Ben Ray Lujan.

Congressman Lujan. Thank you, Madam Leader. And again, if everyone can help me thank Randy Grissom, Kathy Keith, August, Izaiah, Cheneyand everyone who helped us today, again. Thank you, Madam Leader for having us today. Thanks everybody.

So, we think the two-year [community college plan] is the most logical thing that you can do. It may happen in some states before it happens nationally because of the battle of the budget that we have there, but again, it saves money as do Pell Grants, as does reducing the costs of student loans. And Ben Ray referred to it: it frees people, liberates people if they don't have this anvil - I call it the anvil of student debt - this anvil of student debt so that they can be entrepreneurial, they can take risks. August talked about discovery and invention and that entrepreneurial spirit that he has. If a student has all of that and massive debt, they have to make choices that are quite different than if they didn't. And as I say as a mother of five children: they might even get married.

[Laughter]

Take risks. Go out there. What could be more of a risk than starting a small business? It requires more optimism than maybe getting married. But it any event, it frees them to have choices and options - what we want the American people to have.

Congressman Lujan. Thank you. We have time for one more.

Q: [Inaudible]

Leader Pelosi. The question is: can I speak more about the role of women and girls in growing the economy, expanding the economy.

Yes. When I was - well, I don't know if it was the last time, but a recent time when I was in New Mexico, we talked about 'When Women Succeed, America Succeeds' which really is very important for our economy to understand that. Other countries do. The Prime Minister of Japan was in Davos last year. They asked: "How are you going to turn your economy around?" He said, "The involvement of women in our economy." The President of Colombia was in my office. He said: "We have a secret to grow our economy." I said: "Will you share it with us?" He said: "The involvement of women in our economy."

It's really so important. But for it to happen, we have to recognize that some changes have to happen. We have to have affordable, quality child care; we have to have paid sick leave; we have to have equal pay for equal work so that women can really thrive in the economy. But you can't say: "Our country is going to grow and be great but we're going to limit the involvement of half the people in our country," and expect that. Now it doesn't mean women are smarter or better or anything, it just means the beauty is in the mix. Having women at the table is very important. And I would extend that to women and minorities at the table. That's our country. That decision-making should happen with a full participation.

But we know - we have the facts, the figures, the data, the analysis and all the rest of it - if you involve women at every level - whether it's in the military training, whether it's in the academic world, whether it's in corporate America - the more women in leadership, the better. And of course, when it comes to government and politics, the most wholesome thing that we can do is to have more women appointed, elected, and not only having a seat at the table but having a seat at the head of the table.

And that's why I'm so proud that in our Caucus, we are a majority of women, minorities, and LGBT community folks. That's our Caucus - it's a majority of that beautiful mix, 'A'. 'B', not only there, but in our leadership, the people who would be chairs - in other words, when Ben Ray leads us to victory - those Ranking Members will be Chairs. The majority of people who would be Chairs are women, minorities, LGBT. So it's a pretty exciting thing because, again, not only a seat at the table, but a seat at the head of the table. And leading us all in all that is Ben Ray Lujan.

Congressman Lujan. Thank you, Madam Leader. And again, if everyone can help me thank Randy Grissom, Kathy Keith, August, Izaiah, Cheneyand everyone who helped us today, again. Thank you, Madam Leader for having us today. Thanks everybody.

'Grading' New Mexico's Congressional Delegation

BYLINE: Rosanne Boyett

SECTION: NEWS

LENGTH: 488 words

CIBOLA COUNTY - U.S. Congresswoman Michelle Luján Grisham, New Mexico First District, was the main speaker at a March 9 Rally held at the Roundhouse. The two-hour event focused on environmental issues including protecting communities' health and safety rights, renewable energy, and extending tax credits for solar investments.

A variety of community-based groups and several state legislators participated in the discussions, according to Conservations Voters New Mexico officials.

The CVNM had scheduled the event to coincide with the publication of the annual League of Conservation Voters "National Environmental Scorecard."

The 2014 report rated members of Congress on their leadership and their effort to protect the environment. The Scorecard covers the top environmental, energy, and public health votes cast during the second session of the 113th Congress. It included 35 House votes, which ties the record for the most votes ever scored in a single year, according to a LCV recent press release.

The New Mexico delegation members' ratings ranged from the 91st down to the 6th percentile. Congressman Ben Ray Luján was ranked at 91 percent; Congresswoman Luján Grisham received a score of 86 percent. Senators Martin Heinrich and Tom Udall both scored 80 percent; and Representative Steve Pearce was rated at 6 percent.

Congressman Luján, Third District, recently introduced legislation in the House of Representatives focused on remediating some of the consequences of uranium mining.

House Bill 994 expands compensation for those exposed to radiation while working in uranium mines or living downwind from atomic weapons testing sites. A bipartisan coalition, which included Senators Udall and Heinrich, introduced companion legislation in the Senate.

"We are happy that House Bill 994 was re-introduced," said Linda Evers, founding member of Post '71 who lives near Milan. "We look forward to working with Congressman Luján and moving this legislation forward."

"The Environmental Alliance of New Mexico and our members were excited to hear from a parade of conservation champions at Environmental Action Moral Monday on March 9," recalled Molly Sanders, CVNM Education Fund program director.

"The Santa Fe event was an opportunity for citizens to raise their voices at the New Mexico Legislature about issues affecting the health of our communities," added Liliana Castillo, CVNM.

LUJAN: HOUSE REPUBLICAN BUDGET LEAVES MIDDLE-CLASS FAMILIES BEHIND;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 199 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on the House Republican budget.

"Once again House Republicans have introduced a budget that makes steep cuts to areas that are critical to growing the middle class and strengthening our economy, while dismantling Medicare as we know it for New Mexico's seniors. House Republicans provide tax breaks to special interests and billionaires, yet shortchange investments in early education that are vital to our children's future and infrastructure that are essential to putting more New Mexicans to work.

"House Republicans' plan takes away health care coverage for more than 16 million Americans, putting health insurance companies back in charge. With New Mexico near the top in child hunger, the Republican budget lays the foundation for cuts to nutrition programs that help families put food on the table during difficult times. The House Republican budget moves New Mexico and our nation down the wrong path, leaving middle-class families behind."

LUJAN ANNOUNCES CONGRESSIONAL ART COMPETITION FOR HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 721 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District announced today details for this year's Congressional Art Competition. This annual competition allows members of Congress to display the talent and creativity of their high school constituents. The winning entry from each Congressional district will be displayed as part of an exhibit in the United States Capitol for one year. The winner will travel to Washington, D.C. for a reception honoring the national winners.

"The Congressional Art Competition gives New Mexico's young artists the opportunity to display their fine work and share their talents on the national stage," Congressman Lujan said. "I look forward to seeing the creative work from the next generation of artists who will continue in the rich artistic tradition that has long been a part of New Mexico's heritage and culture."

The competition is open to all high school students within the Third Congressional District of New Mexico. All entries must be submitted to Lujan's Santa Fe district office by Tuesday, April 7, 2015 at 5 p.m. The winner will be announced at a reception on Saturday, April 11.

2015 3rd Congressional District of New Mexico General Guidelines for Students

* A photo of each piece of artwork should be submitted with each piece of artwork (Rep. Lujan's office will take a photo of the artwork if the student is unable to produce a photo for submission).

* A completed 2015 Congressional Art Competition Student Information and Release Form (signed by a parent or guardian if the student is under the age of 18), must be submitted with each piece of artwork.

* Winner need not be present at the reception to win.

* Recognition will be given to the top placing pieces of artwork, with the winning piece being displayed in Washington, D.C.

* Artwork must be submitted for review and judging by Tuesday, April 7, 2015 at 5 p.m. to the Santa Fe office of Rep. Lujan.

Attn: Eliza Sultan

1611 Calle Lorca Suite A

Santa Fe, NM 87505

(505) 984-8950

2015 Congressional General Guidelines for Students

* The competition is open to high school students only. Exception may be made for schools that have 7th through 12th grades on one campus.

* Artwork must be two-dimensional.

* Each piece can be no larger than 28"x28"x4" (28 inches high, 28 inches wide, and 4 inches deep), including the frame. Artwork can be submitted to Rep. Lujan's office unframed. If the artwork is selected as the winning piece for display in D.C., it will be required to be framed and must adhere to the size guidelines. Rep.Lujan's office will work with the winner to have the winning piece framed.

* Framed artwork cannot weigh more than 15 lbs.

* Accepted media for artwork are as follows:

o Paintings: oil, acrylics, watercolor, etc.

o Drawings: pastels, colored pencils, pencil, charcoal, ink, markers

o Collages: must be two dimensional

o Prints: lithographs, silkscreen, block prints

o Mixed Media: use of more than two mediums such as pencil, ink, watercolor, etc.

o Computer-Generated art

o Photographs

* Each entry must be original in concept, design, and execution and may not violate U.S. copyright laws. Any entry that has been copied from an existing photo or image that was created by someone other than the student is a violation of the competition rules and will not be accepted.

* Work entered must be in the original medium (that is, not a scanned reproduction of a painting or drawing).

* Artwork will hang in the Capitol for the entire year of the exhibition and cannot be returned to the students earlier. Students should, therefore, submit artwork they will not need for other purposes.

* Artwork must adhere to the policy of the House Office Building Commission. In accordance with this policy, exhibits depicting subjects of contemporary political controversy or a sensationalistic or gruesome nature are not allowed. It is necessary that all artwork be reviewed by the panel chaired by the Architect of the Capitol and any portion not in consonance with the Commission's policy will be omitted from the exhibit. The panel will make the final decision regarding the suitability of all artwork for the Congressional Art Competition exhibition in the Capitol.

Casey, 211 Members of Congress File Supreme Court Brief in Support of Marriage Equality;
Court Set to Hear Arguments in Potentially Landmark Case in April;
Sen. Robert P. Casey, Jr. (D-PA) News Release

SECTION: U.S. SENATE DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 725 words

Washington, DC- Today, U.S. Senator Bob Casey (D-PA) announced that he has joined 211 members of Congress in filing an amicus brief with the U.S. Supreme Court in support of marriage equality as the court considers the issue during this term. The four cases from Ohio, Tennessee, Michigan and Kentucky challenge state laws that prohibit same-sex couples from marrying and deny recognition to lawful marriages performed by other states. The Supreme Court will decide whether the Constitution guarantees same-sex couples the freedom to marry and to have their marriages respected nationwide.

"I'm hopeful that the Supreme Court will soon issue a landmark decision that will achieve equal rights for all Americans," Senator Casey said. "As a U.S. Senator representing Pennsylvania, I have heard from many LGBT Pennsylvanians and their families who want nothing more than equal rights under the law."

Expanding Health Benefits for Uranium Industry Workers

BYLINE: Rosanne Boyett

SECTION: NEWS

LENGTH: 547 words

CIBOLA COUNTY - "We are happy that House Bill 994 was re-introduced," said Linda Evers, founding member of Post '71 who lives near Milan. "We look forward to working with Congressman Luján and moving this legislation forward."

She made her comments after learning that Congressman Ben Ray Luján, New Mexico's Third District, had introduced legislation in the U.S. House of Representatives designed to expand compensation benefits for those exposed to radiation while working in uranium mines or living downwind from atomic weapons testing sites. Companion legislation, SB 331, was introduced in the U.S. Senate by a bipartisan coalition, which included New Mexico Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich.

"Until this gets done - compensating and recognizing the miners, workers, down-winders, and all who are suffering from the impacts of uranium mining and nuclear testing during the Cold War - we will continue to push this legislation forward," said Congressman Luján.

The 2015 amendments to the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act build upon previous RECA legislation by further widening qualifications for compensation for radiation exposure; qualifying Post 1971 uranium workers for compensation; and expanding the downwind exposure area to include Colorado, Idaho, Montana, and New Mexico, as well as any county in Arizona, Nevada, or Utah, which has been shown to be affected by downwind contamination.

Specifically, the 2015 amendments would:

o Add core drillers to the list of compensable employees, which currently only includes miners, millers and ore transporters

o Add renal cancer, or any other chronic renal disease, to the list of compensable diseases for employees of mines and mills; currently, millers and transporters are covered for kidney disease, but miners are not

o Allow claimants to combine work histories to meet the requirement of the legislation - for example, individuals who worked one-half a year in a mill and one-half in a mine would be eligible for compensation. Currently, the Department of Justice has issued some exceptions for this, but the policy is not codified in law.

o Make all claimants available for an equal amount of compensation, specifically

$150,000, regardless of whether they are millers, miners, ore transporters, onsite employees, or down-winders

o Make all claimants eligible for medical benefits. Currently, only miners, millers, and ore transporters can claim medical benefits through the medical expense compensation program o Recognize radiation exposure from the Trinity Test Site in New Mexico as well as nuclear testing done in the Pacific Ocean

o Expand the downwind areas to include all of Arizona, Nevada, New Mexico, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, and Utah for the Nevada Test Site; New Mexico for the Trinity Test Site; and Guam for the Pacific Ocean tests

o Allow the use of affidavits to substantiate employment history, presence in an affected area, and work at a test site; current legislation only allows miners to use affidavits.

"I will continue my efforts to educate my colleagues in the House about the critical need to compensate all those who played a key role in our national security during the Cold War and have suffered as a result of their efforts," said Congressman Luján in a recent press release.

Lujan Statement on Women's History Month

LENGTH: 337 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on Women's History Month, which is celebrated during the month of March.

"Women's History Month is an opportunity to reflect on the contributions and achievements that women have made in every aspect of our society. As we celebrate the progress that has been made, we must continue to push for greater equality, not only for women today, but also for the next generations of women.

"We must continue to fight for fairness in the workplace and commit to policies that support women and their families. Women have an increasingly stronger presence in the workforce; however, a wage gap still exists with women only earning 78 cents for every dollar earned by men, and women of color earning even less. More and more women act as both caretakers and earners, making the issues of paycheck fairness and equal pay important to not just women, but to their families and our economy.

"Expanding educational opportunities for all Americans, including young women, is of critical importance, particularly when it comes to the fields of science, technology, engineering and math that are vital to our economic competitiveness. Women are underrepresented in the STEM fields despite the fact that many discoveries by women have pioneered modern technology and pushed the boundaries of what is possible in the pursuit of knowledge. Encouraging people to study STEM at an early age, especially young ladies, is critical to ensure that instead of just using the next great app, they will be the one to create it.

"This Women's History Month, let us celebrate all that women have accomplished and contributed while continuing to advocate for equality and greater opportunity, because when women succeed, America succeeds."

Iran deal a 'potential nuclear nightmare'; NM reaction to Netanyahu's controversial speech is mixed

BYLINE: Copyright © 2015 Albuquerque Journal BY MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

LENGTH: 1044 words

WASHINGTON - Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu stood before a joint session of Congress on Tuesday and blasted a pending White House deal on Iran's nuclear program, asserting it could "pave the way" to mass destruction in the Middle East.

But he appeared to make little headway with New Mexico Democrats as he encouraged congressional opposition to the Obama administration's negotiating strategy.

The speech at times drew thunderous applause and standing ovations, but some Democrats - including Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M. - remained unmoved and even stone-faced at times. Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., was the only member of the state's delegation to boycott the speech, although he watched from his Senate office.

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., said she was dismayed by Netanyahu's tone, while her guest, Rabbi Harry Rosenfeld of Albuquerque's Congregation Albert, told the Journal that Netanyahu "reinforced the seriousness of the threat that Iran poses to Israel and the world."

Rosenfeld also said that "as an American Jew" he was gratified to witness Congress' enthusiastic support for Israel within the House chamber. He said that although there is no consensus within his congregation about how to deal with the Iranian threat, "everybody is extremely worried."

"People would like a tougher deal than what they are hearing about," Rosenfeld said.

Netanyahu's speech was fraught with controversy because it was not cleared by the White House and Israeli elections are approaching. The Israeli prime minister told Congress that the nuclear agreement the White House is pursuing "doesn't block Iran's path to the bomb; it paves Iran's path to the bomb." He also offered a brief history lesson, reminding Congress of the radical Islamic revolution that transformed Iran's politics 36 years ago.

"Iran's revolutionary regime is deeply rooted in militant Islam, and that's why this regime will always be an enemy of America," Netanyahu said.

"If anyone thinks this deal kicks the can down the road, think again," Netanyahu added. "When we get down that road, we'll face a much more dangerous Iran, a Middle East littered with nuclear bombs and a countdown to a potential nuclear nightmare."

At the White House, President Barack Obama dismissed Netanyahu's speech as "nothing new" and insisted ongoing negotiations toward a deal will best ensure Iran doesn't acquire a nuclear weapon. The White House contends Netanyahu's approach would lead to less - not more - scrutiny of Iran's nuclear program, and that could lead to a need for military action. Obama said Netanyahu's speech "didn't offer any viable alternatives."

"I have repeatedly said that I would rather have no deal than a bad deal," Obama said. "But if we are successful in negotiating then, in fact, this will be the best deal possible to prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon. Nothing else comes close. Sanctions won't do it. Military action would not be as successful as the deal that we have put forward."

Netanyahu insisted that the world demand Iran stop threatening its neighbors in the Middle East, supporting terrorists and vowing to destroy Israel.

"This is a bad deal - a very bad deal," he said of the pending nuclear pact. "We are better-off without it."

Mixed reaction

The atmosphere swirling around Netanyahu's controversial speech rivaled that of a presidential State of the Union address, but with more protesters outside the Capitol and perhaps even more security inside. House Speaker John Boehner, R-Ohio, who presented Netanyahu with a bust of Winston Churchill before his speech, said the prime minister was blunt and effective.

"This was a speech the American people needed to hear, plain and simple," Boehner said. "It addressed the gravity of the threats we face and why we cannot allow a nuclear Iran, or any semblance of a path to a nuclear Iran."

Udall, who sits on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, entered the chamber shortly before Netanyahu's speech and stood in the back. He applauded softly at some of Netatyahu's remarks but remained unmoved by others. Udall said he attended the speech "out of respect for the U.S.-Israel relationship." He also said that although all U.S. leaders oppose a nuclear-armed Iran, American diplomats should be given room to negotiate a deal that prevents such a scenario.

"I have deep concerns with how the speaker (Boehner) and prime minister scheduled his remarks and with the message the prime minister delivered," Udall said. "A resolution would reduce Iran's capability to produce the nuclear materials for a weapon while guaranteeing strict international inspections that allow the international community to respond to any possible nuclear breakout. Attempting to undermine these talks two weeks before the Israeli elections is both crassly political and dangerous. I urge the Congress not to interfere with the negotiations - that is a risky andmyopic road to take."

Rep. Steve Pearce, the delegation's lone Republican, applauded Netanyahu's address.

"The Israeli leader rightfully criticized the administration's ongoing closed-door negotiations between the United States and the Islamic Republic of Iran, which are leading our nation down a very dangerous path and placing our world in harm's way," Pearce said. "We must not turn our backs on Israel in favor of Iran, a country that has proven itself untrustworthy. I stand with Israel. And so should President Obama."

Heinrich said he feared that Netanyahu's approach would lead to a war "that would likely cost our nation dearly in blood and treasure."

"If we abandon negotiations due to unrealistic expectations, then we will undoubtedly lose (international) inspections," Heinrich said. "That would encourage Iran to resume development and would result in a very high likelihood of direct military conflict."

Rep. Ben Ray Luján offered support for Israel.

"Although the timing and planning of the speech was not ideal, our relationship with Israel must remain strong and bipartisan," he said.

Lujan Grisham said, "It was pretty clear (that Netanyahu was saying), 'You've got to decide between what's being recommended to you by the White House and me.'"

"There was no softening. I was hopeful that he would have a softer tone and say, 'Here are my worries.' He didn't do that."

LUJAN STATEMENT ON WOMEN'S HISTORY MONTH; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 321 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on Women's History Month, which is celebrated during the month of March.

"Women's History Month is an opportunity to reflect on the contributions and achievements that women have made in every aspect of our society. As we celebrate the progress that has been made, we must continue to push for greater equality, not only for women today, but also for the next generations of women.

"We must continue to fight for fairness in the workplace and commit to policies that support women and their families. Women have an increasingly stronger presence in the workforce; however, a wage gap still exists with women only earning 78 cents for every dollar earned by men, and women of color earning even less. More and more women act as both caretakers and earners, making the issues of paycheck fairness and equal pay important to not just women, but to their families and our economy.

"Expanding educational opportunities for all Americans, including young women, is of critical importance, particularly when it comes to the fields of science, technology, engineering and math that are vital to our economic competitiveness. Women are underrepresented in the STEM fields despite the fact that many discoveries by women have pioneered modern technology and pushed the boundaries of what is possible in the pursuit of knowledge. Encouraging people to study STEM at an early age, especially young ladies, is critical to ensure that instead of just using the next great app, they will be the one to create it.

"This Women's History Month, let us celebrate all that women have accomplished and contributed while continuing to advocate for equality and greater opportunity, because when women succeed, America succeeds."

Lujan Statement on DHS Funding

LENGTH: 197 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting for a clean bill to fund the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) through the end of the fiscal year.

"By finally joining Democrats in passing a full-year funding bill - a bill that House Republicans could have brought up for a vote anytime in the last three months - the Department of Homeland Security will now have the resources and certainty it needs.

"Since last year, Republicans' political games with stopgap funding bills have had a negative impact on the Department's ability to plan and allocate billions of dollars in grants that fund local emergency management programs that support first responders, such as firefighters and EMTs. DHS will now be able to move forward with these critical grants, but not before the American people learned that House Republicans are willing to put their political security ahead of America's national security."

Looking at the high costs of House Speaker Boehner

BYLINE: By Hal Rhodes Upon Reflection

SECTION: OPINION

LENGTH: 638 words

As these lines are written the bumptious Republican majority that controls the U.S. House seems prepared to shut down the Department of Homeland Security or, perhaps, avoid a shutdown by funding its operations for only three weeks.

It's madness. By a large bipartisan margin, the Senate has already sent the House a measure funding the department through September. It is a straight-forward funding bill, no gimmicks, no distractions. But wingnuts in the Republican House are demanding a measure that includes language invalidating some of President Obama's executive orders on immigration reform. Slipping extraneous stuff like that into a bill is called adding a "poison pill," something calculated to kill a proposal.

House speakers who are serious about getting things done, especially where national security is concerned, usually knock heads of supporters who foster such nonsense and tell them to cool it. But the current House Speaker, John Boehner, acquiesced and tried to borrow three weeks to avoid an immediate shutdown. Boehner has accomplished little as Speaker, but he plainly likes the title.

His latest caper began last fall when congressional Republicans joined Democrats in sending the president a measure funding the federal government, pending his signature. But there was a hitch. Funds for the Department of Homeland Security were withheld, on the understanding that the incoming Republican Senate and House majorities would approve separate Homeland Security funding when the new Congress convened in January.

Just about everyone smelled a skunk. Republicans had created a "bargaining tool" for themselves whereby they could hold Homeland Security hostage to their demands that the president's immigration reforms would be rescinded in return for an HSD funding bill.

Sure enough, when the new Congress undertook to draft a budget for Homeland Security, House Republicans used their majority to attach provisions to the measure that would nullify the president's immigration reforms. Two New Mexico's House members Democrats Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham, voted against it. The third, Republican Steve Pearce voted for it, of course.

There was no way Senate Democrats were going to be blackmailed into eviscerating the president's executive orders by approving the House bill. What's more, Senate rules give the Democrats the tools with which to block the measure.

Boehner fully understood that the immigration provision would be a poison pill in the Senate and would cripple funding for Homeland Security. Prominent Senate Republicans had cautioned the Speaker against allowing such a provision in the bill.

Arizona's John McCain argued that Obama's reforms didn't belong in the legislation, noting that the issues are now before the federal judiciary after a judge in Texas ruled against them. Whereupon, by a 68-31 margin the Senate passed out its own uncluttered funding bill.

Basically the question had become: Why muck things up when the operations of a critical department hang in the balance?

Much has been made of the thousands upon thousands jobs that hang in the balance were Homeland Security employs were to be furloughed and/or made to work without pay.

New Mexico Democratic Sen. Tom Udall estimated that more than 2,300 DHS employees in New Mexico "including 1,780 Customs and Border Protection workers" would be caught in such a shutdown.

Beyond that is the whole specter of agencies and programs critical, literally, to homeland security put in jeopardy at the very time ISIS and other terrorist operations are escalating threats against American targets.

Why would Boehner risk such dangers? Quite simply because he fears being deposed as Speaker if he crosses the rowdy mob of House Republicans upon which his speakership rests.

That's the high price that comes with John Boehner as Speaker.

Most of delegation to see Israeli PM

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. B2

LENGTH: 820 words

Most of New Mexico's congressional delegation will be in the U.S. House Tuesday when Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu gives a controversial speech to a joint session of Congress, but Sen. Martin Heinrich won't be among them.

The speech to Congress, an idea hatched by Netanyahu and House Speaker John Boehner without consulting the White House, comes in the midst of especially tense relations between Washington and Tel Aviv. Netanyahu has criticized the Obama administration's negotiations with Iran on a nuclear deal, with Boehner and most congressional Republicans sympathetic to the Israeli position.

In a show of solidarity with Obama, about two dozen congressional Democrats, including Heinrich, have announced that they will boycott the speech.

"I'm always happy to listen to what Prime Minister Netanyahu has to say," Heinrich said. "I intend to watch his speech about Iran from my office, but I have strong objections to using the floor of the United State Congress as a stage for his election campaign - or anyone's for that matter. The U.S.-Israeli alliance is too important to be politically exploited just days before Israeli voters go to the polls."

The speech has become a politically sensitive issue in part because the Israeli lobby is strong on Capitol Hill and no member of Congress wants to get caught in the cross-hairs of AIPAC, the influential American Israel Public Affairs Committee. The committee's members are arriving in Washington over the weekend in preparation for next week's annual conference in Washington and are urging members of the House and Senate to show up for the speech.

Some Democratic senators, such as moderate Tim Kaine of Virginia, along with liberal independent Bernie Sanders of Vermont, have decided to boycott the speech, noting that it would be more appropriate after Israel's leadership elections on March 17.

Not surprisingly, Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., plans to attend. So does Sen. Tom Udall, a Democrat who sits on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. But Udall's not happy about it.

"Israel is a critical ally in the Middle East, and Sen. Udall will attend the prime minister's speech," his spokeswoman, Jennifer Talhelm, told me Friday. "But he believes Speaker Boehner and Prime Minister Netanyahu made a serious mistake by scheduling this speech on a partisan basis and should reschedule through the normal nonpartisan process for a time after the Israeli elections that is less politically charged."

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, a Democrat and the chairman of the Democrat Congressional Campaign Committee, also said he will be there - grudgingly.

"I plan to attend the Prime Minister's speech," Lujan said in a statement to the Journal on Friday. "I do, however have concerns with how this speech was scheduled and the timing. Our commitment to Israel must remain bipartisan. The failure to properly consult with the White House and Congressional Democrats needlessly injected partisan politics into this issue."

"Despite serious misgivings, Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham will attend the speech," said her spokesman, Gilbert Gallegos.

Former Gov. Gary Johnson is nothing if not tenacious.

The two-term former Republican governor from New Mexico, who has scaled the tallest peaks on all seven continents, recently announced that he will once again run for president in 2016 as a Libertarian.

Johnson sought the White House in 2012 as a Republican only to be mostly stymied in his attempts at to be included in the GOP debates. Johnson ultimately dropped his quest to win the Republican nomination and secured the Libertarian Party's presidential nomination instead.

He received 1 percent of the vote, a paltry number by election standards but still a record for a Libertarian candidate.

Johnson, who is now president and CEO of Washington state-based Cannibas Sativa Inc., is still banging the drum for marijuana legalization. That's why he was at CPAC - the Conservative Political Action Conference - in suburban Washington, D.C., on Thursday. Johnson debated legalization with Anne Marie Buerkle of the U.S. Consumer Products Safety Commission, who argued against pot as "mind-altering" and "destructive," as well as problematic for still developing children.

Johnson was viewed as a radical Republican on this issue when he first announced his support for legalization as governor in 1999, but judging by sometimes enthusiastic applause for Johnson's views at the conservative conference on Thursday, the party has evolved on this issue.

The growing influence of libertarian dogma into conservative circles has certainly helped fuel the shift. At CPAC, Johnson touted pot as a medicinal miracle and a safer alternative to drinking alcohol.

"Having a debate about marijuana legalization is like having a debate about whether the sun is going to come up tomorrow," Johnson said. "The sun is going to come up. Marijuana is going to be legalized."

WITNESSES: SYLVIA MATHEWS BURWELL, SECRETARY, THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

[*] PITTS: The subcommittee will come to order. The Chair will recognize himself for an opening statement.

I would like to thank Secretary Burwell for appearing before the Subcommittee to discuss the administration's FY2016 budget request for the Department of Health and Human Services. Earlier this year, Madam Secretary, you stated that, quote, "The hallmark of effective leadership is instilling a culture of transparency, ownership, and accountability," end quote.

These are all laudable goals and I appreciate your verbal commitment to these principles. However, your Department's actions have failed to adhere to the same standard. For example, we have only heard silence from the White House on how the administration is preparing for an adverse ruling in King v. Burwell.

We did receive a reply from you, and I thank you for that courtesy. But your letter contained no substantive answers to our questions. During your testimony to the Senate Finance Committee, you were again asked about the administration's plans. And, again, you repeatedly declined to provide a direct answer.

And, you know, this is not the transparency that we had hoped for. Understandably, we were very frustrated with Administration witnesses artfully dodging the questions we ask here. And so I'm asking you today, please let your guard down a little and give us direct and complete answers to our questions.

In 2009, the president correctly said, quote, "The real problem with our long-term deficit actually has to do with our entitlement obligations," end quote. Since then we have had the Simpson-Bowles Commission, a supercommittee, sequestration, and a government shutdown, and never once in all this time did the administration propose a plan to get the nation's fiscal House in order by recommending reforms to entitlements.

The 2014 Medicare Trustees Report, which you signed, tells us that Medicare will be bankrupt very soon. We recently had Senator Joe Lieberman and former OMB Director Alice Rivlin here. And they told us much the same. We stand ready to do the hard work of saving and strengthening Medicare. But we need a willing partner.

Once again, the president's budget fails to propose serious entitlement reform. The proposals in the budget related to Medicaid amount to saving just 15 days worth of program spending over the next 10 years. The plan, apparently, is to let Medicare expenditures continue to grow without any of the structural reforms needed to strengthen and save this critical program. And this is not taking ownership.

If we are going to save and strengthen our safety net programs for the most vulnerable, we have to do better than the president's budget. Both parties have to work together. You, we, and the president need to work together to save our entitlement programs to make them sustainable. So we ask that you please work with us.

On another subject, you may also remember that, in early November of last year, we spoke on the phone about why HHS has so far failed to hold California accountable under federal law. As you know, on August 22, 2014, the California Department for Managed Health Care --DMHC, issued a directive mandating that all plans under DMHC authority immediately include coverage for all legal abortions.

This is in direct violation of the Weldon Amendment, a civil rights statute that prohibits federal taxpayer funding for Federal agencies and state or local governments that discriminate because a health care entity does not provide, pay for, provide coverage of, or refer for abortions.

What California is doing is clearly illegal. It is also morally wrong, and violates the fundamental principles of freedom and conscience that our democracy is founded on. And it is your job to stop them, and so far that hasn't happened.

I'll have more to say about this when we get to questions. In the mean time, Madam Secretary, we look forward to your testimony. We hope that you will stay to answer all of our questions, and, with only five minutes of questions per member, we respectfully ask that you keep your answers concise and to the point.

And Dr. Burgess, do you want the remaining time?

BURGESS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It's very kind of you.

And Secretary, thank you for coming to our humble little subcommittee. I am frustrated over the administration's lack of transparency and the ability for Congress to get information that realistically, we've been asking for the last four or five years, but specifically around ACA-created entities -- the Center for Medicare and Medicaid Innovation, the Prevention in Public Health Fund, the Consumer Information -- the Office of Consumer Information and Insurance Oversight and the Patient Center for Outcomes and Research Initiative.

Year after year, they have failed to achieve their mission of reducing health care cost and improving quality. We can't hold them accountable if we don't know how you're spending the dollars, so we, you and I have talked about this. And I do look forward to our responses in being able to finally get that information regarding those agencies under your (inaudible).

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman.

And I recognize the Ranking Member, Mr. Green, five minutes for an opening statement.

GREEN: Good morning and thank you, Secretary Burwell for being here today to discuss the president's FY '16 budget proposal for the Department of Health and Human Services.

The budget is more than a line of items on a page. It's a reflection of the priorities of our country. Our commitment must be to protect the progress that we made and to make strategic investments so that progress will continue in the future.

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the creation of Medicare and Medicaid. Since the Children's Health Insurance Program was created to ensure America's children have insurance, most recently Congress passed the Affordable Care Act, dramatically expanding access to health coverage and high quality care.

The Affordable Care Act took historic steps toward laying the foundation for a better and more efficient health care system and expanding access to cover for millions of Americans for whom it was previously out of reach.

It also took important steps to restore the fiscal solvency of our health care system. According to the most recent estimates by the Congressional Budget Office, the Affordable Care Act will reduce the deficit by more than $100 billion for the first decade and by more than $1 trillion in the second decade.

As we have seen through the second enrollment period, the Affordable Care Act has already succeeded in ensuring every American can have access to high quality affordable coverage. Thanks to the ACA nearly, 30 million Americans got covered. These are people who would otherwise be uninsured. We have made great progress, but the work is not done. I thank the agency for implementing the landmark health reform law and continuing to work with us so that they can build on these successes.

It's -- in addition to prioritizing essential services and programs, I was pleased to see that the budget makes strategic investments to improve our health care system and clear the way for the progress into the future. This includes funding to support training of the next generation of health care providers, national preparedness against threats to public health, biomedical research, drug safety and mental health services.

The budget invests in community health centers to support the care that provide for 22 million patients in their role at providing an accessible, reliable source of primary care in underserved communities. Health centers will continue to be a critical element in our health system. The president's proposal takes a critical important step by including four years of funding for the children's healthcare insurance program.

Currently, more than 10 million children get health care insurance through CHIP. Additional funding for CHIP must be authorized so that there is no disruption in coverage and the states are able to continue operating their programs.

The budget proposes the increase in NIH funding, since its creation NIH is fostered new remarkable advancements in human health, but for the past decade, NIH has suffered inadequate funding. Without significant funding increases, the U.S. will lose its status as a global real leader in science and innovation. Additional resources will help defeat our nation's most harmful diseases and ensure that the United States continues to lead biomedical research and scientific breakthroughs.

The budget proposal strengthens national preparedness for threats to public health including naturally occurring threats and deliberate attacks. It also includes funding to reinforce our nation's ability to move quickly to detect infectious disease outbreaks through a new Advanced Molecular Detection initiative, maintaining strong expertise at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

These are just a few highlights of what is included in the proposed HHS budget. I look forward to hearing more about the administration's proposal during today's hearing.

Thank you, Madam Secretary for your -- joining the committee to discuss the HHS budget. And if someone would like about a minute and 20 seconds -- my colleague from California, Ms. Matsui.

MATSUI: Thank you very much for yielding me time. I welcome Secretary Burwell. I appreciate the goals the president and you have laid forth in the fiscal budget 2016, Department of HHS services budget. Building on the improvements made by the Affordable Care Act we're seeking to move our nation's health system by rewarding volume and forgetting about the waste business. So -- what we try to do this is working to achieve the triple aim in health care -- better care, better outcomes, and reduced cost.

We do this by making health insurance more affordable, by emphasizing prevention and public health, by encouraging scientific and clinical research, by taking advantage of the benefits of technology and building up our nation's mental health system.

Many of the proposals in the budget find savings in the Medicare Medicaid programs, by streamlining processes and realigning systems to ensure that patients get the right service at the right time.

The budget will make the SGR fix permanent, which we need to do to provide stability for doctors and for seniors and people with disabilities in the Medicare program. The budget will also extend its Children's Health Insurance Program or CHIP, that provides much needed pediatric coverage to our nation's children.

To conclude, I want to emphasize the Affordable Care Act is working. Over 11 million Americans signed up this year, including 500,000 in California alone. The Administration just announced that since law was enacted in 2010, 9.4 million with Medicare have saved over $15 billion in prescription drugs. This is what we set out to do and appreciate working with you as we move forward.

Thank you. I yield back.

PITTS: The Gentlelady yields back.

The Chair now recognizes the chairman of the full committee, Mr. Upton for five minutes for opening statement.

UPTON: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Secretary Burwell, welcome.

Today marks your first official appearance before the Health Subcommittee, but I know that this is not your first time in this room, as you participated in one of our 21st Century Cures roundtables last year. And we very much appreciate that participation.

Your testimony does come at a very pivotal point in health policy, from our exciting cures effort to next week's Supreme Court oral arguments. We look forward to hearing the administration's perspective on the many important issues facing the American people.

You have said during your tenure at HHS that transparency, ownership, and accountability are important values for the department to demonstrate, which we certainly welcome. In that spirit, we look forward to gaining straightforward answers here today about implementation of the president's health care law.

There have been quite a few red flags raised in recent weeks on the continued struggles to implement key pieces of the health law. Just in the last week, 800,000 Households learned that key tax forms sent out by the administration contained major errors. Those Americans were asked to delay tax filing, therefore also delaying their refunds. A recent analysis from H&R Block estimates that the majority of Obamacare customers are being forced to pay back some of those subsidies.

Millions of Americans are also now learning about the law's IRS fines for failing to comply with the individual mandate. The backlash has been so intense that the administration has resorted to yet another special enrollment period to quell some of the anger of those who are just coming to learn about the individual mandate penalty.

And just last week, the healthcare,gov CEO Kevin Counihan suggested that the back-end functions of the exchanges would undergo a two-year development plan. That means this key part of the law will not be fully complete until President Obama leaves the White House.

Collectively, these revelations suggest that the health care law is still not working. Our constituents deserve better. We know that. That is why I have worked on introducing the Patient CARE Act, a health care reform blueprint with my colleagues in the Senate, Chairman Hatch, and Mr. Burr. I look forward to working with my colleagues about these ideas to improve health care in America by empowering states and families, not Washington.

Yes we have concerns with the president's signature law. But there are other important health areas that we believe are fertile for collaboration. For the past year, almost a year and a half, this committee has undertaken the bipartisan 21st Century Cures initiative to accelerate the pace of the discovery, development, and delivery of new treatments and cures for American patients.

I would like to thank you for your personal engagement on the 21st Century Cures initiative. As you know, this is a top priority for our committee this year. Patients and families in my district in Michigan and as well as across the country are looking for hope, and that's what we seek to instill.

And this effort is also important to many job creators as well, whether itbe Stryker, Perrigo or Pfizer in southwest Michigan. I also want to thank the staff throughout the administration, particularly at the FDA and the NIH, for their work, their time, and effort to help us improve the ideas released by our committee at the end of last month. We've established a very good foundation, I think, for bipartisan success. And I will yield to other Republican members on this side. Seeing none.

PITTS: (inaudible) none.

UPTON: I yield back.

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman. I now recognize the ranking member of the full committee, Mr.Pallone for five minutes for opening statement.

PALLONE: Thank you, Chairman Pitts and welcome Secretary Burwell. Thank you for being with us today.

Today, we're going to hear about the president's fiscal year 2016 health and human services budget proposal. And there are many important provisions in the president's budget that we in Congress must work to support.

I was pleased to see that the budget proposed a funding increase of $1 billion for the NIH investing in early stage basic research is one of the most promising ways that we can accelerate the discovery of new treatments and cures.

And support for NIH is critical to building our economy as well. Every dollar of NIH funding generates over $2 in local economic growth. Yet, we have let NIH purchasing power decline by over 20 percent since 2003, and that's why finding a way to significantly increase funding for NIH will be my top priority as the 21st Century Cures initiative continues. I was also pleased to see that the budget fully funds a four-year extension of the Children Health Insurance Program or CHIP. We must act on this proposal immediately with more than four-fifths of state legislatures adjourning by the end of June.

Lack of action and clarity from Congress will make budgeting and planning virtually impossible. By every measure, CHIP has become enormously successful and always has had strong bipartisan support. So extending CHIP funding should be the top priority of this committee to ensure consistent coverage for the millions of children who depend on this program. And I think we can all agree that no child should be left worse off because of the actions or lack thereof of Congress.

The budget also adopts the framework of the bipartisan bicameral SGR repeal and replacement legislation the Congress agreed to last year. I believe that because the sustainable growth rate is the result of a budget gimmick and we already spent $169 billion paying to fix the problem, that offsets especially those within our health programs are not necessary.

And if we must include offsets, the war savings which are known as the Overseas Contingency Operation Funds, could be used. I know some on the other side of the aisle don't share this view. What I do hope is that we can -- we can agree that first SGR should be paid off, should not be paid off on the backs of the beneficiaries.

Beneficiaries have already paid for their share of the cost of SGR repeal through higher premiums and half of all of the beneficiaries live on less than $23,500 per year. And that's why some of the proposals in the president's budget concern me.

The President's budget proposes to further increase Part B and Part D premiums, increase the Part B deductible for new enrollees and impose a new surcharge on the part B premium for beneficiaries with certain Medicare policies and also institutes a $100 copayment per home health episode.

And this increases out of pocket cost on beneficiaries and I think that, you know, we've had -- we've seen enough of that, beneficiaries may forego necessary services and as a result use more high cost acute care services, and such policies will disproportionately affect lower and middle income beneficiaries who are not poor enough for Medicaid nor have access to employer-sponsored retiree health care.

So I urge the president and my colleagues to be extremely cautious when proposing cuts to Medicare and consider the impacts on our seniors. The last thing I wanted to mention is, well, first to commend you, Secretary, for your agency's hard work implementing the Affordable Care Act. Because of your efforts, 19 million uninsured Americans will be covered in this year 2015. And I recognize the challenge your agency faces in implementing this law with limited resources. However, despite what I call Republican obstructionism, the Affordable Care Act is working.

In sum, I think this is a sound budget. And I look forward to hearing from you today. And I would yield the remainder of my time to the gentlewoman from Florida, Ms. Castor.

CASTOR: Well, I thank the ranking member for yielding time.

And I welcome Secretary Burwell. We're very excited to hear about the budget, the investments in medical research, in children's health insurance, improvements in Medicare and the Centers for Disease Control, but I couldn't help but ask Mr. Pallone for a minute to highlight the Florida enrollment numbers under the ACA.

It's remarkable. And I know you've seen them. And we've talked about it. As of February 15th, over 1.6 million Floridians have signed up for health insurance in the federally facilitated marketplace. We were surprised. This exceeded all of our expectations to beat California and Texas, especially in a state that had many fits and starts over, whether to assist our neighbors in signing up.

But I wanted to highlight a couple of stories, that a 24-year- old, third year law student at the University of South Florida got assistance from the navigator. His income is about $16,000 a year in scholarships. He was able to find insurance for approximately $10 per month, zero deductible. It's his second year enrolling in the marketplace. He's very happy with his coverage. There are stories like that again, and again, and again, so I look forward to talking about it. Thank you.

PITTS: The Gentlelady yields back. That concludes the oral opening statements. As usual, all the written opening statements of members will be made a part of the record. And so, we'll go now to Secretary Burwell.

First of all, thank you for appearing for us today, Madam Secretary. Your written testimony will be made a part of the record. You'll be given five minutes to summarize your testimony. And we certainly appreciate you being here this morning. And you're recognized for five minutes for your summary.

BURWELL: Thank you, Chairman Pitts, Chairman Upton, Ranking Member Pallone, and Ranking Member Green, and members of the committee. I appreciate the invitation to be here today. I want to thank you for the opportunity to discuss the president's budget for the Department of Health and Human Services. I believe firmly that we all share common interests, and therefore we have a number of opportunities for common ground, from preventing and treating substance abuse to advancing the promise of precision medicine, to building an innovation economy and strengthening the American middle class.

The budget before you makes critical investments in health care, science, innovation and human services. It maintains our responsible stewardship of the taxpayers' dollars. It strengthens our work together with the Congress to prepare our nation for key challenges both at home and abroad.

For HHS, it proposes $83.8 billion in discretionary budget authority and this is a $4.8 billion increase, which will allow our Department to deliver impact today and lay a strong foundation for tomorrow.

It's fiscally responsible budget, which in tandem with accompanying legislative proposals would save taxpayers a net estimated $250 billion over the next decade. In addition, it is projected to continue slowing the growth of Medicare.

It could secure 200 -- $423 billion in savings as we build a smarter, healthier, better system. In terms of providing all Americans with the access to quality affordable health care, it builds upon our historic progress in reducing the number of uninsured and improving coverage for families who already have insurance.

We saw a recent example of this progress with the about 11.4 million Americans who either signed up or reenrolled in this past open enrollment. It extends CHIP for years. It covers newly eligible adults in the 28 states plus D.C. which have expanded Medicaid and then improves access to health for Native Americans.

To support communities throughout the country, including underserved communities, it invests $4.2 billion in health centers and $14.12 billion to bolster our nation's health workforce. It is -- it's more than 50,000 National Health Service core clinicians, serving nearly 16 million patients in high-need areas across the country.

With health center mandatory funding ending in 2016, we estimate that more than 7 million Americans may lose access to essential cost- effective primary care. And this could approximately result in 40,000 jobs lost.

To advance our common interest in building a better, smarter, healthier delivery system, the budget supports improvements to the way care is delivered, providers are paid and information is distributed.

On an issue for which there is bipartisan agreement, it replaces Medicare's broad sustainable growth rate formula and supports a long- term policy solution to fix the SGR. The Administration supports the type of bipartisan bicameral efforts that the Congress took last year. To advance our shared vision for leading the world in science and innovation, it increases funding for the NIH by $1 billion to advance biomedical and behavioral research. In addition, it invests 215 million for the precision medicine initiative, an effort to focus on developing treatments, diagnostics and prevention strategies tailored to individual genetic characteristics.

To further our common interest in providing Americans with the building blocks for success at every stage of life, this budget outlines an ambitious plan to make affordable quality childcare available to every working class, middle class family.

To keep Americans healthy, the budget strengthens our public health infrastructure with $975 million for domestic, an international preparedness including critical funds to the global health security agenda. The budget will support CDCs critical infrastructure and crosscutting research to facilitate rapid response to public health emergencies and public health threats like the recent measles outbreak.

It also invests in behavioral health sciences and substance use prevention. Finally, as we look to leave our Department stronger, the budget invest in our shared priorities of cracking down on waste, fraud, and abuse initiatives and are projected to yield $22 billion in gross savings for Medicare. We're also addressing our Medicare appeals backlog with a variety of approaches and we're investing in cyber security.

As I close, I want to make one final point and that is I am personally committed to responding quickly and thoughtful to the concerns of Congress and members. Since I was confirmed, I've made a top priority of our Department to respond promptly and thoroughly and work with you as we can. I also just want to take one moment to thank the HHS employees for all their work on Ebola, unaccompanied children and all the other issues.

With that, I look forward to your questions. Thank you.

PITTS: Thank you, Madam Secretary.

I will begin the question -- and questioning and recognize myself five minutes for that purpose. Let me start with the King v. Burwell, in a few short days, the Supreme Court will be hearing oral arguments in the King v. Burwell case that could have a major impact on Obamacare.

In January, we sent you a letter asking for any actions, analysis or -- and/or contingency plans that HHS has undertaken to prepare if the IRS rule is overturned. And while we received a letter from you earlier this week, your response failed to actually answer our question. The letter simply stated that you believe no administrative action by HHS could reverse the effects of a decision in favor of the plaintiffs.

Madam Secretary, your statement of opinion in the letter does not answer our simple question, so let me ask you the question this way. Have you or senior department officials instructed counselors within HHS to prepare any potential actions or approaches if the Supreme Court rules against the IRS?

BURWELL: Mr. Pitts and Mr. Chairman, with regards to what is in the letter, one of the things that I think is important to reflect that is in the letter is the analysis of what would happen. That is a part of the letter.

And in terms of what would happen, and I first should state, we believe that the court will decide in favor of the position we hold, which is we believe that this law says that people who have traveled across the country, people in Texas should have the same subsidies as people in New York, so important starting point.

But with regard with what would happen, because I think that's an important part of answering the question, first, what would happen is when those subsidies go away, 11.4 million people, that was the number I gave you. As of January 30th, when we did our most recent analysis, 87 percent of the individuals in the marketplace are eligible for subsidies. Those subsidies are on average estimated to be $268 per individual per month. Those subsidies, number one, would go away.

PITTS: Yeah.

BURWELL: That would lead to a number ...

PITTS: Madam Secretary, I understand that. I'm asking if you know of any plan to respond to approaches if the Supreme Court rules against the IRS, has the White House, has the OMB or other administration officials directed or asked you about any approaches in response to King v. Burwell or the work with the Treasury Department on potential responses? That's my question.

BURWELL: So in order to respond to the question, Mr. Chairman, in order to think about the question of a plan, one needs to, I think analyze the problem, which is what I was articulating in terms of the three major things that would occur if the court decides with the plaintiffs.

PITTS: Let me ask it at a different way. I would like to provide you some more information, that's why we expect you answer from you today. The committee received recently specific information from a source within your department about the existence of an approximately 100 page document related to potential actions HHS may take if the Supreme Court rules against the administration in King vs. Burwell, are you or senior staff at HHS or whatever this document?

BURWELL: Mr. Chairman, this is not a document I am not aware of. With regard to the question that you have asked, as I've said in the letter, we believe and I think it's very important to understand the damage because it is related to the answer. The damage comes in the number of uninsured that would occur. Number two, it occurs, and what happens in the individual market place where a group of less healthy individuals come in and that drives premiums up in that market place. And number three, the indigent care that occurs from the uninsured and what that means in both those states in terms of their economies as well as what it means for employer base. Those are the ramifications.

With regard to those things which we believe are the damage, as I state in the letter, we believe we do not have any administrative actions and therefore, there is not...

PITTS: All right, let me ask - going to another issue, I as you know as we discussed over the phone, I'm deeply concerned about the lack of HHS action regarding California and the DMHC authority to immediately include coverage for abortion. And this mandate, California mandate is a clear violation of the Weldon amendment which provides civil rights protections and prohibits funding to government entities discriminating against healthcare entities for following their conscience. Do you agree that the Burwell plan prohibits funding for states that mandate abortion coverage in insurance plans?

BURWELL: We take the Burwell amendment very seriously and since you spoke with me, Mr. Chairman, and we received those letters, we have opened an investigation in the office of civil rights at HHS to investigate the concerns that you and others have articulated. We take this seriously and are trying to move through that investigation is expeditiously as possible (inaudible).

PITTS: Since it's clear that California is in violation of federal law, can you project a date by which you expect the violation to be stopped?

BURWELL: With regard to the issue of the investigation, Mr. Chairman that's not something I need to let the investigation go and I have asked the team to make sure they do it as expeditiously as possible. But in order that I stay away from the investigation in terms of my interference in any way I want to let them go forward, but I have asked for due speed.

PITTS: OK. We'll follow up. Thank you. The chair recognize the Ranking Member Green for his questions.

GREEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Madam Secretary, it's been almost five years since the Affordable Care Act was passed and I have yet to see any legislation introduced by my Republican colleagues to replace the Affordable Care Act even though we've had at least 56 votes on the House floor to repeal it. Given all these talk of repealing the Affordable Care Act, are you aware of any requests for technical assistance from Republicans on legislation that would replace the Affordable Care Act with a credible proposal to provide comprehensive health coverage to millions of Americans?

BURWELL: I am not aware of those requests.

GREEN: Madam Secretary, over the last couple of days we've heard a lot about contingency plans, if the millions of American's who received financial help through the Affordable Care Act would lose them. Are you aware of any Republican legislative proposals that would provide millions of Americans with the financial assistance that help them with affordable health care coverage?

BURWELL: I am not aware. GREEN: Secretary, I want to get your input on an issue that I know your concern and I appreciate you're addressing in your opening remarks that myself and a lot of members of our committee, there's a funding cliff that's facing our community health centers. Health centers serve nearly 22 million patients and are projected to serve 28.6 million patients over - in over 9,000 locations across the country in the Fiscal Year of 2016. Because of the patient demographics and statutory mandate to locate in underserved areas or to serve underserved populations, health centers are well positioned to provide health care service to millions of newly insured Americans.

They are particularly important in our district. It's federally designated underserved community in Houston, Texas. Secretary Burwell, I was pleased to see the present budget included multi-year extension of mandatory funding for health centers. As you know the health centers' patients face a major loss of access in the few months. If we don't act or to prevent the funding cliff caused by the exploration of the mandatory funding at the end of the fiscal year. Can you speak about the importance of community health centers within our health system as we look at the issues of access, quality and cost?

BURWELL: We believe that they are our fundamental underpinning and not just in terms of health care in communities, but they are also an important part of the economics of communities when you think about the fact that we could lose up to 40,000 estimated jobs in terms of - if we don't extend. But as you think about the numbers thinking that one in 15 Americans actually are served by these health centers. How integral they are to providing primary care throughout the country.

And so, I think it's extremely important to continue that so that we can as we've reduced the number of uninsured, we also want to make sure that those people are having care and those that had care before still have access to that care, especially in our underserved communities across the country, not all, but many of which are very rural.

GREEN: Can you comment on the impact of the funding cuts would have on patients' access to care? Can you estimate how many fewer people would be able to receive services at our local health centers?

BURWELL: Are estimates are that if we aren't able to extend that it could be up to seven million patients who would no longer be able to have access to that care. We estimate that perhaps over 2,000 of the centers would shut down without that and that, then there are the patients who would not be served because people would have to scale back in the number of the centers with reduce funding.

GREEN: In those 2,000 centers do you know how many jobs we'd lost?

BURWELL: Approximately, the estimates are up to 40,000.

GREEN: OK. Thank you. The health centers are a crucial part of our nation's primary care infrastructure for 50 years and have long had a truly bipartisan support. And last year along with my colleagues on both sides including Representative Lance, support for reiterating our support for health centers in calling for a bipartisan solution, we had 250 co-signers including 31 members of our committee. A similar letter in the Senate gathered 66 votes and more than hundred national organizations have called for a fix. Consensus is something that must be done and we have to act as soon as possible.

This issue is a top priority of mine and I know a lot of other members literally Republican and Democrat across the country to look forward to working with you and our colleagues on the committee on a bipartisan basis to find the solution to avert that funding cliff.

Mr. Chairman, I have 43 seconds left and I'd like to yield for somebody for that 43 seconds on our side. Anybody want about 30 seconds now? OK. Well, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

PITTS: Thank you. The chair now recognizes the chairman of the full committee Mr. Upton, five minutes for questions.

UPTON: Thank you again, Mr. Chairman. Secretary Burwell, there are a number of healthcare law implementation issues that continue to trouble us, in the interest of time I'd ask that you submit answers to the following questions in writing within two weeks.

The CEO of healthcare.gov recently stated that there is a two- year development plan for the backend of the healthcare.gov. If you could provide us an estimate of when the backend will finally be fully automated will be great. Second one is HSS recently announced that 800,000 Americans enrolled in coverage through healthcare.gov received inaccurate tax forms under the ACA.

We'd like a detailed assessment on what - on when the department expects these taxpayers will have accurate information in hand so that they can file their taxes. And third, many Americans were automatically re-enrolled in exchange plans, raising concerns that individuals and families may be getting unexpected premium bills or inaccurate exchange subsidies in 2015. We would ask that you submit specific data on the number of Americans who have been automatically re-enrolled in those exchange plans, that'd be helpful.

BURWELL: I'd be happy to.

UPTON: Now, I'll return to 21st Century Cure and again, I appreciate your personal assistance with this and I - for the record, I want to certainly thank Dr. Collins (ph), Commissioner Hamburg (ph), Dr. Woodcock (ph) and Dr. Shuren (ph), countless others at your department for the help on 21st Century Cure. Because of that participation and participation of folks from across the country we've been able to learn more about the status of innovation in this country and we hear about ways to accelerate the discovery, development, and delivery of cures and treatments for patients.

As we heard at our first round table, there are over 10,000 diseases and we have only cures and treatments for about 500. So, we have a great deal of work ahead to do. We released a discussion document last month and I've been working with the Congresswoman to get, Mr. Ranking Member Pallone, Mr. Green, other members of our committee on both sides of the aisle to improve that document.

One area that includes a placeholder is precision medicine, something that the president talked about in the state of the union address and subsequently a White House event a couple of weeks ago. We put that place - we did put that placeholder into the draft and we look forward to continuing to work with you and the White House, the administration on that important issue. Could you give us some background on the administration precision medicine policy and what we should look forward to?

BURWELL: Thank you and thank you for the partnership as we work through these issues and it's exciting to have the energy around these issues including the precision medicine, which I think a subset of the broader issues you're looking at.

Our precision medicine initiative is $215 million with regard to as we think about it from a budget perspective, but I think thinking about it from the pieces and what it's doing, one part of the initiative is creating a very large database of a million people through NIH, but we will access that through other channels so that we're drawing from existing databases to get the information we need. Because as we're talking about what this is, precision medicine or personalized medicine is getting the information so that we can do treatments that are to the individual. I was at NIH recently. I had the opportunity to both see the tumors and meet the cancer patient of a kidney cancer patient where he had had a group of tumors removed, they came back.

But then, using precision medicine, which meant looking specifically at the genetic makeup of his tumors that could be treated in a different way, I met him. That happened months ago and now he - the patient was there discussing with me and is in a very different place.

So, one, that large database, two, specifically focusing in the area of cancer because we already are seeing some progress there and we believe that place is ripe for it. The other thing we need to do is FDA to make sure that as we think about precision medicine we regulate and think about how to approve these things in ways of a different type of medicine. And then, finally, we need the health records, the office of national coordinator for health - electronic health records to be a part of making sure this will do with payments and how clinicians will use. Those are the elements.

UPTON: But I just want to say that's very helpful and we're excited as well. And though I've been out to the NIH a number of times in the past number of years I want to remind members here that we've got a committee trip, we've invited I think all the members on this sub-committee to go out to the NIH next Monday morning.

Dr. Collins has been very interested in having us out to kick the tires like you saw yourself and I know that because we have votes tomorrow Friday and again on Monday and perhaps over the weekend, there may be more of us here over the weekend than originally thought. So, I want to remind members that they're invited to join with us and not miss votes Monday on a trip there and I yield back. Thank you very much.

PITTS: Sure. Thanks, Gentleman. I recognize the Ranking Member of the full committee, Mr. Pallone. Five minutes for your question, sir.

PALLONE: Secretary Burwell, you know, I'm sure you can sense that I'm very proud of the Affordable Care Act and concerned about Republican efforts to repeal it or now take it to court in the case of King versus Burwell. Are you aware of any Republican bill that would reduce the number of uninsured in this country by 11 million people or I said 11, it's actually 19 million people, the way that the Affordable Care Act does? I mean, obviously, I'm saying this because I don't see them coming up with any alternative.

BURWELL: You know, we haven't and I think it's important to reflect historically, when one looks at the history and actually I've gone back to Teddy Roosevelt and the quotations from Teddy Roosevelt forward to both Republican and Democratic administrations. We see whether it was President Bush, President Nixon, you know, Republican and Democrat, plus President Clinton. The conversation about how we make this next step forward with regard to reducing uninsured is something that we struggled with as a nation.

And this is the first time and someone reflected on the anniversary of Medicare and Medicaid - Medicare, in that 50 year anniversary, this is the first time that we have seen that. And so the plan that we have in place, the implementation of the Affordable Care Act has done that, but we have not seen any alternatives.

PALLONE: All right, let me ask you about CHIP all the Democrats on the committee recently introduced the bill to extend the CHIP program and I want to emphasize again that we have to act on this legislation immediately when we considered SGR which expires at the end of March. Well, funding may not expire until the end of September for CHIP. In fact, 20 states will finish their legislative sessions by the end of April and more than half by June 1st.

So it's clear that Congress needs to act swiftly to ensure states can budget appropriately for CHIP and to avoid any disruptions in children's coverage. So given the bipartisan history of this program I see no reason why Congress can't act very soon. Can you comment on the impact on states if the CHIP funding isn't extended soon?

BURWELL: I would comment on that from two different perspectives, one as a former director of OMB and the issues of predictability of funding and the issues of management and ability to manage. And so for the states to be able to do that, this is something that's important when we had predictability in our own budget system. We've seen the benefits of that economically throughout the past years, two years.

And the other thing I would say is having just spent a lot of time with the governors this weekend when they were in town. This is a very important issue to them. We have seen that letter that 40 governors have signed with regard to knowing that they have that predictability of a program that is providing great benefits to the children in their states.

PALLONE: Now, the Senate and House Republicans have released the CHIP proposal this week. However, this proposal would institute a 12- month waiting period, needlessly forces low income children off of Medicaid and on to CHIP and reduces or completely discontinues coverage for children above 250 percent of the federal poverty level despite the choice of 28 states around our nation to cover those kids. Can you discuss the impact of policies like this on some of our most vulnerable children?

BURWELL: So I think, we think that the CHIP program ss a program that was a bipartisan program and a program that is working in delivering results in terms of that quality healthcare for those children. And it has worked, we believe that it's in our budget, a four-year extension of the program is a very important thing and that we need to do that in the timely fashion to both make sure those children are covered and receive the care that they need. But also in addition to that have predictability for states, especially those states that are in their legislative process right now.

PALLONE: And I know you mentioned that four year extension, the budget includes a four year extension of the CHIP program. Can you talk about why that full extension of four years is so critical for the kids that depend on this health coverage and maybe also mention as part of the extension, the budget includes a permanent extension of express lane eligibility, if you'd talk about the success of express lane eligibility as an option for states.

BURWELL: So the express lane eligibility and those issues, we - folks ask us to try and figure out ways to simplify, to make things easier and that's making things easier in two ways, when hear from folks, it's about both the customer in terms of when they came in as well as the states. And we believe this is a program that's been successful in getting to that simplicity and the simplicity often can work to create either, a, better quality or, b, lower cost and so, we think that's important. With regard to the four years we believe that is a good amount of time and the right amount of time for us to do this extension. There will be interaction with the Affordable Care Act, we know that and we believe that the four year period is the right period for us to understand and look at that.

PALLONE: Thank you. Mr. Chairman, I'd like to submit for the record two CHIP articles, the first is an op ed published in the New York Times this month by Former Secretary Hilary Clinton and Former Senator Bill Frist (ph) discussing the long term bipartisan history of the program and the importance of a four year extension. And the second article was published in New York Times last month shows how health coverage for children pays for itself and all the research showing that when children have health coverage future earnings are boosted, if I could...

PITTS: Without objection ordered.

PALLONE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

PITTS: The chairman yields - the Gentleman yields back - the chair recognizes the chair emeritus to the full committee, Mr. Barton for five minutes for questions.

BARTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being in here. As I have talked to you before there are a lots of problems that we have deal with, you in your position and the committee in our position. But there are some opportunities for bipartisanship and one of them is a piece of legislation that we call the ACE Kids Act. The original co-sponsors are Ms. Castor of Florida, Ms. (inaudible) of California, Mr. Green of Texas, myself on the Republican side along with several other members of this committee on the majority side.

You've said in your opening statement that the Medicaid is going to be about $345 billion this year, an increase of I believe of over 16 billion. Well, there is one piece of legislation we could pass on a bipartisan basis that would actually save money in Medicaid and that's the ACE Kids Act. It creates a home for families that have medically complex children based on an anchor hospital concept with the major children's hospitals in America, I think there are about 60 of them.

So if a parent has a child that's medically complex and qualifies for the program, that child gets access to the network on kind of a one-stop shop, all the specialties, all the various procedures are provided. Medicaid is billed one time. We think there are 12 million children that would qualify for the program and we believe that it will save billions of dollars over a ten year period.

It's been introduced in the Senate. The identical bill with three Republican co-sponsors, three Democrat co-sponsors, so here's a rare piece of legislation that both sides that I will support, the Republican leadership supports it, Chairman Upton supports it, Chairman Pitts supports it. Does your department have a position on the bill and if so could you explain to the committee what that position is?

BURWELL: So with regard to the specific legislation, I don't think we as the administration have issued a (inaudible) but I would say is all of the concepts we agree and we welcome the opportunity. The idea that we can improve both quality and cost for these children who are very complex and who are moving state to state and the current system doesn't afford us the opportunity both with regard to making sure we don't have duplicative payments, we obviously do not want that from a fiscal responsibility. And we want that ease that the parent can have the child at the right place with the right care even if it's across state lines. So I would just say we look forward to working with you.

Welcome the opportunity if there are questions and ways that we can provide, technical assistance and other things as part of this, we welcome that opportunity because we agree with the fundamental of what we're trying to do here and believe this is something that can improve both cost and quality.

BARTON: Well, I would encourage you and your department to take a look at the bill. It's not illegal or immoral for the administration to issue a letter of support and this is one that I think with Chairman Upton and Chairman Pitts and the ranking member and the full committee and sub-committee and leadership on both sides of the aisle in the House, this bill could go.

It could be a part of Chairman Upton's 21st Century effort or it could be a standalone bill. I also in the brief time I have want to concur with Ranking Member Green said about community health centers. I hope we can work together in a bipartisan fashion to find an answer to keep those funded. I know there's a funding issue this year that we need to address and reauthorize the program. I have a number of those health centers in my Congressional district and they are very helpful providing indigent care.

And finally, I wasn't going to ask this question but I'm a little bit puzzled when Chairman Pitts asked you the question about this report that deals with planning in case the health exchanges at the state level under the Affordable Care Act are found to not be legal the way they're currently funded, if there was a plan and if you had seen the plan. I'd take you at your word that you haven't seen the plan, but you don't think it's prudent that there should be a plan? I mean I hope I don't have a primary opponent. I hope I don't have a general election opponent, but I have a plan in case I do. I know you hope that the court upholds your position, but shouldn't the - shouldn't the administration and your agency have a plan in case it fails?

BURWELL: Congressman, what we seek in the letter and what we believe is if the court decides, which we don't believe they will, but if the court decides on behalf of the plaintiff, if the Supreme Court of the United States says that the subsidies are not available to the people of Texas, we don't have an administrative action that we could take. So the question of having a plan, we don't have an administrative action that we believe can undo the damage. And that's why when I was answering the chairman, I think, it's important to understand what the damage is because then it comes to the question of we don't believe we have any administrative...

BARTON: So my time has expired, but if the court strikes it down, the administration is just going to hold up your hands and say we surrender?

BURWELL: What we believe is - we believe the laws as it stands is how it should be implemented.

BARTON: I understand.

BURWELL: And with regard to when the Supreme Court speaks, if the Supreme Court speaks to this issue, we do not believe that there is an administrative authority that we have in our power to undo it. And so that's something we don't believe we have.

BARTON: That's puzzling but I accept that. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your courtesy and the minority for letting me have the extra time.

PITTS: Sure. Thanks, Gentleman. And now I recognize the Gentleman from New York, Mr. Engel, five minutes for your questions. ENGEL: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman and welcome Secretary Burwell. Let me piggyback on backup plan. You know, I was part of this committee, I participated in months in months of deliberations for the Affordable Healthcare Act. We had weeks of markups, this committee did, and not once was the mention of subsidies not being available to individuals in states that did not set up their own exchanges.

I've heard a lot of complaints on the other side of the aisle about the law but never was this issue discussed until they lost at the Supreme Court in 2012. Some of my friends signed on to amicus and wasted incredible time forcing votes on the full repeal of the law, yet they're upset that the administration doesn't have a back up plan should the Supreme Court ruling threaten the availability of subsidies for 8.6 million Americans, and I think it's somewhat ironic that my Republican friends are demanding that this administration fix problems that they themselves created and have shown zero interest in fixing.

Should the Republicans get what they want and the Supreme Court rules in favor of King, I would urge my colleagues if that should happen to pass legislation to ensure that Americans have continued access to affordable coverage through the federal facilitated exchange just as Democrats intended. Next month the Affordable Care Act will have been the law of the land for five years. It's not a perfect law and there are issues that need to be changed with it, but I would like to see those issues addressed, unless both of us in a bipartisan way turn our focus on improving the law and enabling more quality coverage options for our constituents instead of trying to kill it, repeal it, take it to court and things like that. So, I just wanted to say that I'm sure that you agree with what I just said.

BURWELL: Yes. We look forward to moving forward and we do want to make improvements as we can.

ENGEL: Thank you. And I want to use my home state of New York as a great example of what's possible when the federal government has a willing and enthusiastic partner in the affordable healthcare implementation. As a result of our successful exchange and Medicaid expansion more than 2.1 million New Yorkers have quality healthcare coverage. Our state's uninsured rate has dropped to only 10 percent and there is clear evidence we are reaching the right people too, since 88 percent of people who obtain coverage through the exchange reported being uninsured at the time they enrolled.

So, it's really working in New York. And the health insurance options available through New York State of health are on average 50 percent cheaper than the comparable coverage available before the exchange was established. So, I want you to know, I'm sure you know it, that the ACA is working and working well in New York and that's why I really think it's terrible that I've been forced to take more than 50 votes to repeal some or all of this law. We should fix what's wrong, but in my state, it's really been a tremendous success.

BURWELL: And fortunately, I've had the opportunity to travel the country and see the individuals, those are the numbers and the individuals and whether it's Laura in Florida, 26 years old, married to someone who's a truck driver who does not have coverage. She is training to be an X-ray tech. They have two children. They did not have insurance. She now has insurance with a premium of $41 a month. Or a woman who had a MS in the State of Texas and for 17 years she had not had health insurance. And so how people go about - she treated her MS through the emergency room and she has four children and she works. And so when it would get bad enough, that's what she would do. And so the stories of what it means to people in terms of their financial and health security I think are - the numbers are important but it is those stories which really make this real.

ENGEL: And, you know, Secretary Burwell, I understand that we have seen robust exchange enrollment nationwide even in states where Republican governors refused to set up a state exchange or expand their Medicaid programs, isn't this true?

BURWELL: So the numbers and I spoke to this yesterday when we've been able to look at the numbers, 53 percent of the enrollees in the marketplace this year, in the federal market place are new enrollments. And so I think that is indicating the demand for the product and the need for the product.

ENGEL: Thank you. I want to second Mr. Pallone's positive discussions about CHIP. I've always been a strong supporter and as of July, 2014 an estimated 476,000 children were enrolled in this affordable coverage option for their care in New York. And so, I think that that is really, really important. I was pleased therefore to see that the budget proposal for FY 2016 included funding - included funding for CHIP for the next four years to FY 2019. So can you elaborate on what you believe increasing tobacco taxes is a viable means for funding this program while we sort out the transition issues associated with the Affordable Care Act?

BURWELL: We believe - one of the things we're trying to be physically responsible and indicating how we are paying for things. We believe that this is a legitimate way to pay for things, especially in the context of we are providing health care and something that we'll hopefully crate a deterrent and help healthcare in terms of the issue of the tobacco tax. As one analyzes across the department and whether it's a CMS or CDC the impact that tobacco has on health in our nation and the cost of healthcare in our nation is one that we think is a fair place to go to pay for this care for the children.

ENGEL: I agree with you and finally, I want to talk about graduate medical education because I was concerned that the administration's proposal to cut indirect GME funding, one in six positions in America obtains training in my home state of New York and we have some of the finest academic and medical centers in the country. So it requires significant funding and time to develop the infrastructure and expertise necessary to ensure quality care is available. So how do we ensure stability for these academic and medical centers and the patients they serve if we put GME funding at risk?

BURWELL: We believe and hope that our proposal does not do that and meets the objectives of making sure we are training appropriate physicians for both primary care and specialties where we don't have as many as we should, at the same time making sure that we target it. There's $100 million for pediatric, and then a wider pool for competition. It's an issue that we want to meet the same objectives, at the same time we do it in a fiscally responsible way.

ENGEL: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

PITTS: Thank the Gentleman, I will recognize is the vice- chairman from the subcommittee, Mr. Guthrie for five minutes for questions.

GUTHRIE: Thank you, Madam Secretary for coming, and I really look forward on 21st Century Cures, and all the things that we can work on over the next few years as vice-chair.

But first I'd like to direct your attention to the Cost Share Reduction Program contained in the ACA, specifically Sections 1402 and 1412. Does any part of this budget request -- or does any part of this budget that we're talking about today request any new authority, including any transfer authority to pay insurers under the Cost Share Reduction Program?

BURWELL: With regard to the program, which is a program as you know is about making sure that the cost of healthcare to those individuals that are coming into the marketplace is something that they can afford. That's what's it's about. And we believe that we do have the authorities to do the cost sharing.

GUTHRIE: Is there any new authority requested in this budget?

BURWELL: No new language.

GUTHRIE: There's no new language? And so, we do know it's up and running. I think we spent $3 billion already on the Cost Share Reduction Program that has been to insurers from taxpayer funds.

The budget that's been submitted estimates $11.2 billion over 2015, 2016. And CBO says $175 billion over the next 10 years is what they've estimated. And could you cite where the appropriations authority is -- as I said you do believe you have the authority, can you cite where that is?

BURWELL: We do believe we do and I'm sure you know that right now that this is an issue that is under litigation, and a court case that has been brought. And so, with regard to that, that is an issue that I will let our colleagues at the Justice Department speak to because of the place it is in litigation.

GUTHRIE: I understand that but we're doing oversight here. I'm not an attorney. And so, you had -- when you were at OMB -- at OMB in 2014 there actually was a request in the 2014 budget for direct appropriation. And that didn't happen for whatever reason but we're spending money.

So whether we spend a penny or 100 -- this is a $175 billion over a 10-year program. I mean, we feel like we -- this is an oversight hearing, not a -- and so, we feel like it's our responsibility to make sure to our taxpayers that we have good answers is on where this is coming from. So we're just asking for where the appropriation comes from -- authority...

BURWELL: I understand and I appreciate -- and I appreciate the question and I'm sorry that it is in litigation. I wish we weren't in a place where we are in litigation but when something has entered into that place it does create a difficult circumstance. I respect the issue of oversight but because the litigation has been brought by the House on this issue we're in a place where I think that is the appropriate place for this conversation...

GUTHRIE: I'm just not aware of any pending litigation exception in oversight hearing questions. And is there like a legal case or authority, or did the Justice Department tell you, you don't have to...

BURWELL: With regard to issues that are being litigated, generally, those are matters that we refer and let the Justice Department continue on.

GUTHRIE: And I am sure that you're aware that we've never been able to get an answer from the administration from where the language -- nobody has been able to point to us where that appropriation language comes from. And it was -- and you previously had requested appropriation.

Let me ask you another question. Recently you received -- I think 18 employers groups sent you a letter urging that small groups be maintained at 50 employees. And they were citing an actuarial analysis that showed when they go to 50 to 51 they -- the acturial analysis said that it would estimate it that two-thirds of the members, that they would receive an increase of 18 percent. And I honestly don't believe that these small employers, 51 to 100 employees can accept an 18 percent increase in their premiums.

Also the promise that if you like the plan you can keep it, because if they have -- if the 51 to 100 have to go into the new plan they'll have to meet the requirements of the healthcare law that essential benefits and the other things that have caused other people to lose their -- the plans that they like if they could keep -- and due to this impact would you support allowing states to keep their market at 50 or below, and not go to the 51 to 100?

BURWELL: This is an issue that we are looking at and examining because we have a number of comments on it. And I would say is I would welcome -- I would welcome the opportunity to see the piece of work that you're talking about and referring to so that we can see and understand that. I think what we want to do is understand the facts around this type of thing. So I would welcome the opportunity to see this study and piece of work that you're articulating.

GUTHRIE: OK. My understanding it has been submitted, a letter from this 18 employers, but we'll make sure that that -- that is forwarded. BURWELL: OK.

GUTHRIE: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I yield back.

PITTS: Sure. And I thank the Gentleman.

And I now recognize the Gentlelady from Illinois, Ms. Schakowsky for five minutes for questions.

SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here today. I wanted to ask you if you are aware of any Republican legislative proposals that would keep insurance companies from denying coverage from people with pre-existing conditions like cancer or dropping someone from coverage because they got in an accident or got sick.

BURWELL: I'm not aware of a piece of legislation that would take care of that issue.

SCHAKOWSKY: And are you aware of any Republican legislative proposal that would provide access to preventive services like cancer screenings, yearly wellness exams and do that at no additional out-of- pocket cost to consumers?

BURWELL: I am not aware of a piece of legislation that would do that in the fulsome way that the ACA does.

SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you. I wanted to talk a little bit about something that's a growing concern and that's Alzheimer's Disease, and the cost that it is in our personal lives and also in funding. So, scores of public agencies, including many HHS agencies, as well as numerous private and nonprofit organizations are trying to address this challenge of preventing Alzheimer's, serving those who have dementia today, finding a cure. Shouldn't the federal government be coordinating a plan on Alzheimer's?

BURWELL: In terms of the issue of coordination there is a body and advisory group that includes both people from the federal government, as well as external folks to be a part of putting together our thoughts and strategies. And this is -- it informs that we are doing investments. There are members of the federal government, across the government, as well as external bodies that are a part of that.

With regard to the work at the department, the work cuts across a number of different areas, NIH and research is generally what comes to mind from those people, but where the biggest dollars are spent is actually in CMS, and making sure that we're thinking through the issues and in that space because that's where the dollar is.

The other thing is the administration for community living is where we work on and think about things like those that are caregivers, and those that are going through that process of dementia and how they deal with it. So at the department we work through all of those. There are these overall advisory groups that we have externally and includes internal members.

SCHAKOWSKY: So, the population is aging rapidly obviously and Alzheimer's is taking a much bigger toll than ever on families, on healthcare systems, on people who have the disease. And the number of people living with dementia will continue to grow as Baby Boomers age. So you had mentioned that the research is going on, so what is HHS, NIH is doing to find a cure?

BURWELL: In this budget you see a 24 percent increase to funding for Alzheimer's which is much greater than the percentage increase even within the other NIH. So, focusing deeply on doing that is also part of the brain initiative as we think through their specific issues.

But we were also making progress on something called Teal (ph), which is a protein that is indicative of Alzheimer's. That's one of the pieces of research that's going on. And if we can make progress there -- the other piece of research is seeing if there are ways that we can slow the progression by understanding how the neural channels move and what's happening in the disease. Those are pieces of research that we're starting.

We believe that with the funding we're asking for, that we can move that research. We can broaden it and we can make it faster.

SCHAKOWSKY: So, dementia is a major focus of work in the United Kingdom and other developed countries. Are we keeping up with the rest of the world in research activities and investments?

BURWELL: You know, we believe that we are with regard to that. And I have been in touch with my colleagues and the secretary or the minister in the U.K. and continue to have those conversations.

So we make sure that we are learning and staying connected to our colleagues especially -- that's a particular example where I have been in touch Minister Hunt (ph) and we'll continue to do that so that we'll make sure that we're learning everything we can from our colleagues and in places where we can work together and see if we can leverage the efforts that are going in each of our countries. And that's both across the research, the regulation, as well as the more social issues.

SCHAKOWSKY: And who is on the Alzheimer's Advisory Committee? I'm asking that because shouldn't there be a person with Alzheimer's as part of the group?

BURWELL: I want to get back to you directly but it is my understanding that there is a person, that there is a slot, and that there -- either there is or will be a person that that does have -- but that is part of the committee. And I want to get back to you on that very specifically.

SCHAKOWSKY: Well, I thank you for the focus and as the co-chair of the senior task force of the Democratic Caucus I really want to work with you on that because this is a problem affecting so many families and individuals. I appreciate it. And I yield back. Thank you.

PITTS: The chair would like to thank the Gentlelady.

And I recognize the Gentleman from Kentucky Mr. Whitfield, five minutes for questions.

WHITFIELD: Thank you.

Secretary Burwell, well, I also want to thank you for being with us today and I want to just follow up on my colleague Brett Guthrie's question.

We're concerned about this cost reduction program because -- Cost Sharing Program because it's a $170 some billion over a number of years. And we understand that that's one of the issues involved in the lawsuit. But all we're asking you is since you all are dispersing the money what is your opinion as to where the appropriation is designated that you're working from?

BURWELL: This is an issue -- and as I said I understand the question. We believe we have the authorities. With regards to the specifics of that, because we are in litigation...

WHITFIELD: But you can't tell us where the money is coming from?

BURWELL: With regard to having that conversation that is what...

WHITFIELD: Were you instructed by DOJ not to answer that question?

BURWELL: With regard to that specific issue that is at the root of the litigation.

WHITFIELD: Were you instructed by DOJ not to answer the question?

BURWELL: With regard to -- when (inaudible) litigation like this , this is our standard...

WHITFIELD: Well, you know, yesterday we had Jenny McCarthy (ph) here and we were talking about 111-D (ph), which is before the Supreme Court right now. And she gave us her theory of why she thought she was right.

We're not saying that we're right or you're right, we're simply asking what is your theory, where does the money come from in your view?

BURWELL: That is something, as I said -- why don't I work to get back to you on where we feel comfortable with where the litigation is and I'd like to come back on that.

WHITFIELD: Well, I must say I have been impressed with your facility to use numbers. You were -- you're really tuned in to the budget, responding to Mr. Pitts, responding to Mr. Green about the community health centers.

I was at a Rotary Club meeting recently and I was asked the question. They said, "Congressman, can you tell us what dollar amount has been incurred by the federal government as a result of state expansion of Medicaid programs pursuant to the Affordable Care Act because we picked up a larger percentage of the normal cost."

And I would ask you that question. I didn't know the answer. But could you tell me what is the total dollar amount incurred by the federal government by the expansion of the state Medicaid programs a result of the Affordable Care Act?

BURWELL: In terms of the federal dollars versus the state dollars?

WHITFIELD: Yes, just the additional dollar amount incurred by us.

BURWELL: Let me go back and look because the question of being able to de-segregate whether a person came in because of expansion, or we're under the old rules. I think I would want to make sure that we can understand...

WHITFIELD: But you don't have a -- you don't have a dollar amount for that?

BURWELL: I'm not -- I don't know. I will check with the department if we do. The one thing that I think...

WHITFIELD: We would think that you all would definitely know that because that -- you know, we can all talk about the advantages and disadvantages of this program, but there is a big additional cost to the federal government. And we're simply asking, I'm asking what is that total dollar amount incurred?

BURWELL: I think the question that I am not sure is how one breaks out the actual number from expansion because when people come through...

WHITFIELD: Well, let me ask you this question...

BURWELL: That's where...

WHITFIELD: And what year does -- the states were encouraged to expand Medicaid which is fine because the federal government is picking up more of that dollar amount. But at some point in the future the federal government is not going to be picking up those additional costs.

What year is that?

BURWELL: What year that is, is we never go below -- the federal government never goes below a 90 percent of the payment of the additional...

WHITFIELD: Until when? BURWELL: And that is 2020...

WHITFIELD: 2020...

BURWELL: And so, 2016 is the year through which there is a 100...

WHITFIELD: OK.

BURWELL: And in your own state...

WHITFIELD: Well, do you have any projected cost over that period of time for the federal government.

BURWELL: No, you have those incorporated in our budget. But one of the things in terms of these cost issues that I think are important in the state of Kentucky...

WHITFIELD: OK. Well, that's OK. Listen, you can't answer the question but I appreciate it anyway.

And then let me ask you this. I noticed that you all made $2.5 billion in loans in the coops. And Kentucky has a good coop program as well.

We sent a letter last year and we were concerned about the solvency of some of these coops. And the federal government, as I said, its loan is $2.5 billion. We now see that in Iowa and in Nebraska those coops are in bankruptcy.

Have you all done any analysis to project -- are there other states that there is a chance that these coops are going to bankruptcy, or are you looking at that?

BURWELL: We are looking at the coops that -- the one thing that I think is very important to note is the cuts, the deep cuts in the funding for coops. When the program was originally designed and the passage of the Affordable Care Act occurred, the amount of money for the coops to do the loans -- and the loans that states like Iowa would have made a difference -- at the end because those monies were cut, they were cut as part of sequestration, they were cut in '12. They were cut in '11. They were cut in '13.

WHITFIELD: So are you saying that bankruptcy occurred because of sequestration?

BURWELL: What I am saying is that had we had more funding in order to provide the additional loans to the coops it could have made a difference. With regard to the fundamental of your question which is are we looking at the coops? And there are two things that we want to do, understand whether they are stable. And then the second is where we can provide technical assistance.

WHITFIELD: Well, those questions that you couldn't answer or were not familiar with , I do hope that you will get back with us with those answers soon... BURWELL: I would be happy to...

WHITFIELD: Within seven days if possible. Thank you.

BURWELL: I will -- I want to make sure that we will get back as quickly as...

WHITFIELD: Because I got to -- have to be back at that Rotary Club next week.

BURWELL: As a neighboring state I appreciate that.

PITTS: The Gentleman yields back.

The chair recognizes the Gentlelady from Florida Ms. Castor for five minutes.

CASTOR: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, thank you again on behalf of the 1.6 million Floridians that were able to buy affordable health insurance in our exchange. I will give you due credit and to everyone at HHS. But I think the real credit goes to our terrific navigators that were on the ground, hospitals across the state of Florida, community health centers and family members that probably put in a good word for their sons and daughters, or aunts and uncles to sign up. You probably want to give them a pat on the back yourself this morning. I'd encourage you to do that.

BURWELL: I do. I want to express appreciation. I've seen the local stakeholders. I've met with them across this country and it was the communities coming together. It was individuals. It was people in the community health centers. As was mentioned it was the business people. It was everyone when I would visit, the hospitals would be there. Everyone would be around the table working on this issue together. And it was that kind of work, and then the individuals that I visited on the Second Sunday (ph) and in Texas.

Actually I was given the opportunity to speak at one of the churches and it was all about coming together to give this information to people so that they could make choices, and have that financial and health security.

CASTOR: So in Florida we have a very competitive marketplace as well. Consumers could choose from 14 different issuers in the marketplace this year. That was up from last year where we had 11.

And Florida consumers could choose from an average of 42 health plans in their county for 2015 coverage. So with 1.6 million now enrolled it really demonstrates the high stakes involved with the Supreme Court case that the court will hear next week. I cannot imagine that the Court would rule to take that away from over a million and a half Floridians and then millions more all across the country.

And just like Representative Engel said -- I was here during the hearings in advance of the Affordable Care Act adoption, during the mark-up, during the amendment process, during negotiations with the United States Senate, never in those discussions was there any dichotomy between a state exchange and a federal exchange, and the availability of tax credits.

Have you seen any evidence to the contrary in your review of the record and the case that's before the Supreme Court?

BURWELL: With regard I would let the Justice Department who has reviewed everything. But the thing that I agree with is that we don't think that that was -- we just don't believe that that's what the law says, or what was intended by the law either.

CASTOR: Yes. And I can say straightforwardly as a member of this committee what the legislative intent was, and it was for those tax credits to be available to every American, no matter if they're in the state marketplace or a federal marketplace.

But I would say if the Court rules otherwise they're going to create chaos and they're going to strike right at the heart of the economic security of so many of my neighbors in Florida and many Americans. So, I know that they will study the legislative intent and I hope they rule the right way and we don't have to address that chaotic situation.

But I think that with the Affordable Care Act the real untold story is what has happened to people who have insurance, because I can cheer on the million and a half Floridians that now have it, but most of my neighbors already have insurance, private insurance or Medicare.

And I know there's more good news that was announced for my neighbors that rely on Medicare. Just in Florida alone Floridians have saved almost a billion dollars since 2010 because of the ACA's doughnut hole discount. Three hundred, almost 350,000 beneficiaries saw savings in 2014 to the tune of about $300 million last year. The average discount per beneficiary was $884.

Then for private insurance how come we haven't been able to get the word out on how much better an insurance policy -- a consumer can't be kicked off if they get sick. In Florida alone over 200,000 young adults can stay on their parents' plan. Floridians have received millions of dollars in rebates because the law says you have new rights and protections and insurance companies cannot spend that money on profits. It has to go to -- it can't spend the profits on salaries and excessive profits, it has to go to healthcare. How come -- what else can the administration do to tell this good news story?

BURWELL: I think we can do a better job of making sure people do know. And then another area is the issue of preventative care and the importance of the fact that your childhood visits and those things will no longer require co-pays or cost sharing in terms of when you go in for that or measles.

An important thing, I think, right now, and timely thing. And so, I think we need to do a better job of making sure people know about those improvements to quality.

CASTOR: Thank you. I yield back. PITTS: The chair thanks the lady.

And I recognize the Gentleman from Illinois Mr. Shimkus for five minutes for questions.

SHIMKUS: Thank you.

Secretary Burwell, thank you. I talked to your staff prior and I appreciate your outreach trying to call. It was a crazy day and I talked to them before you came to the table. And I do have great respect for that. But I also want to make sure that, you know, this happy-clap talk about how great the healthcare is and the Affordable Care Act is moderated by real concerns out there.

Remember the bill that passed and signed to the law we had nothing to do with it on the House side. It was a Senate health bill that came over to us that we passed, right? So that's the healthcare law that we have today. And the language of law is pretty clear. And I'm concerned also that the Supreme Court will rule that the federal exchanges in states are not authorized to receive subsidies and we just need -- we need to be prepared for that here. And I would hope the administration would be too.

I promised two ladies from my Congressional district that I would mention their names. Angie Eskar (ph) from Teutopolis who is pro- life, of strong family and she cannot buy a policy that does not have abortion or abortion coverage. And for millions in America this is a really important issue. And she -- and this is an emotional -- just like on the other side you know how this debate is. And I -- and I think part of the agreement from some of my pro-life Democrats was to ensure that that option would be available and it's just not for her.

The other one is Debbie McKinney-Huff (ph) from a town called Highland (ph). She's a Democrat. Her premiums went up astronomically last year. This year they've gone up another $2,000 with a $10,000 deductible. And she can't afford it. So for all the happy dancers there are -- there are challenges out there that we don't do our constituents service if we don't understand that there are problems that have to be resolved.

There are some budget requests that I want to talk about. And so, I'm going to move forward but I would just put that in the record. I'm a big supporter of Medicare Advantage. You know, I was here when we passed it. Seniors didn't have any prescription drug coverage. It's been very successful. It's very popular. The budget request makes a reduction again in that where the enrollment is going up, favorable are high and 670,000 people weren't able to access Medicaid Advantage. And if you are from rural parts of this country that option is very limited, if not -- or it doesn't exist. So I would ask that we re-look at that so that seniors who want to have this option can choose that. And our concern is your budget hurts the ability for that to happen.

BURWELL: So with regard to the first issue in terms of your two constituents I want to make sure that we understand that. On the issue of abortion in that.... SHIMKUS: And then let's just -- let's just answer this question because I got two more on the budget that I'm trying to address...

BURWELL: That we just focus on the Medicare Advantage issue.

SHIMKUS: Thank you.

BURWELL: With regard to that we want to make sure -- the program during the period of changes that we have had we've seen a large increase in the number of people in Medicare Advantage claims. I want to understand your 670 because 99 percent of beneficiaries have access to MA plans. And there may be something. And so, I'd like to understand that 670 better.

The third thing is that we know that those number of plans quality that have gone from four stars -- you know, gone to the higher ratings we've gone for 67 percent in the two highest rating categories at 17 percent to 67 percent. So we're improving quality.

More people are coming in this system and there is premium control. So, I want to understand the 670.

We want to make sure and are listening. We author our plans as we hear concerns, that's why I want to understand that 670 because we believe that we can continue making these changes.

It comes back to some of the points raised with regard to deficits and making sure that we're being responsible.

SHIMKUS: OK.

BURWELL: MedPAC and the GAO recommended that there is up-coding and we need to work on it.

SHIMKUS: OK. Thank you.

Are you aware of any efforts by FDA to accelerate the next round of user fee negotiations? And our concerns is if they are and they're not doing due diligence about the fees and the return on investment we would hope that they would not accelerate it until due diligence is done.

And the last thing I wanted to address was the Biologics Price Competition and Innovation Act -- stakeholders have to be involved in that. And that's really part of this 21st Century Cures debate. Not just having bureaucrats or panels but bringing patient, bringing physicians and bring in the like -- and our concern is that's not happening on this -- on the Biologics Price Competition and Innovation Act and those -- and those concerns.

And so, if you take that suggestion and if you want to come back and follow up on a lot of these issues we'd be happy to talk with you.

Again, I do appreciate you reaching out personally and I look forward to working with you.

BURWELL: And I do appreciate this issue of stakeholder input. We think it's important to making sure that we get this right.

SHIMKUS: Thank you very much.

PITTS: The chair thanks the Gentleman.

The chair now recognizes the Gentlelady from California Ms. Matsui for five minutes for questions.

MITSUI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Secretary Burwell, thank you for being here. I want to talk about mental health. When we think about health we need to consider the whole person. Mental health has historically taken a backseat to physical health, but the head is connected to the body and one affects the other.

I have been working for years with my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, and both sides at the capital to make changes, to fix our broken mental health system. And as you know a demonstration project based on The Excellence in Mental Health Act that I co-authored with my colleague here Congressman Lance into law last year.

And I look forward to working with you as -- and the administration to make sure that this is implemented properly and in a way that states can demonstrate success.

I also look forward to working with you to make further changes and improve our mental health system. I was pleased to see that the budget will eliminate Medicare's 190 day mental health services -- more in line -- and to keep that more in line with the physical for which no limit exists.

Can you briefly talk about that policy and how it will benefit seniors and people with disabilities who need psychiatric services?

BURWELL: Our overall approach in the mental health space and it's one that we consider a priority is to try and get us in terms of both care and payment to parity with how we think about other health issues.

And there are steps that we are taking throughout the budget and whether it's implementation of the piece of legislation that you referred, and the issue that your colleague just raised about stakeholder engagement and making sure that we're getting that input as we implement it. And so, we're implementing and thinking about the policies to promote behavioral and mental health through our payment system and making sure that there is parity. That seems to be something that's been important.

We're trying to focus on access because many people, the question of access to the right types of providers in terms of behavioral health, that's something you see in some of our analysis at that time. Budgeting work in terms of making sure that SAMHSA (ph) and others are ensuring that we have providers. And then there's access, and that's an issue for all people of all ages but especially young people getting the access that they need.

And so, as we think about all of the pieces working together about the funding, about the access and then -- that there are providers that can provide.

MITSUI: I appreciate that. And as we move forward there is a continuum of mental health issues that we need to address. And it's a complicated issue and we certainly would like to work with you as we move forward on that.

And I would like to also talk about seniors because that's a special interest area (ph) of mine too. And as we consider changes to the Medicare program our first priority should always be senior, especially knowing spend about 14 percent of their Household income on healthcare costs compared to five percent of Households who do not have a Medicare beneficiary.

And we need to find ways to save money in the Medicare program and we have been, but not by cutting benefits but by realigning incentives to improve outcomes in patient care. If a senior gets the right care at the right time it's not only better for the senior but it also saves the system a lot of money.

And now I appreciate some of the provisions in the budget and I would like to discuss this further with you. The budget seeks to save money by restoring trial (ph) rebates for the dual eligible population in Medicare.

Secretary Burwell, can you please elaborate on that?

BURWELL: In terms of the dual eligible policy?

MITSUI: Yes. Right. The drug rebates and dual eligible population.

BURWELL: One of the things that -- the dual eligible population has two elements to it. It is both a very complicated populated because there are people who have a number of different conditions that are being treated in different ways. It's also a very expensive population.

And as we work to improve both the quality and affordability of the care that's what we're trying to do as we look at these proposals. And it's all a part of the broader issue of delivery system reform which you touched on a little bit. And we have set out clear goals.

For the first time ever we have said that in the area of Medicare, that by 2016 we have set a goal that 30 percent of all payments will be in different payment systems, where we are not paying for volume but paying for value. And as a part of -- we move forward to this changed system, we want to do that. That's about price but it's also about quality. And this is a proposal that we're trying to move forward on both. MITSUI: And I know that this is going to be difficult because there are areas where you have to look at the budget. But as we look at this we also have to look at the seniors and that's really why when we look at this -- I know you seek to increase sort of the skin in the game for Medicare beneficiaries.

However I would argue that seniors already have a lot of skin in the game and Medicare and that additional cost sharing will not bring down costs in the program. And as you know as they have increased costs -- you look at -- most of them are supported by Social Security and then that -- what they do is shift over the cost to pay for their healthcare from Social Security. And so, I think it's something that we really have to look at more holistically.

So, thank you very much for everything that you're doing.

PITTS: And I thank the Gentlelady.

And now I recognize the Gentleman from Pennsylvania Dr. Murphy for five minutes for questions.

MURPHY: Welcome here, Madam Secretary. I appreciate you being here. I also want to associate myself with the comments of my friend Ms. Matsui of California about mental health, and I look forward to working with you on those things. In a related area we've had a number of hearings here regarding mental health and among them has been the Substance Abuse and the Mental Health Service Administration. We've asked them repeatedly for information over almost a year for getting some records.

Chairman Upton and I have asked for these things. We have not gotten those documents. And we're concerned about their delays. I wonder if you could help us get some assurance that we'll get those documents from SAMHSA (ph)?

BURWELL: As you and I had the opportunity to discuss this, this is something that we are working on. And I'm hopeful that very soon you'll have some of those documents and we'll continue to work with you on it.

MURPHY: Thank you. I appreciate your teamwork on this.

On another question when we passed the SGR patch, I think it was last year, there was also a demo project, which is what Ms. Matsui was also referring to, for certified community behavioral health clinics to improve access.

Now as part of this we also attach something for AOT, assisted outpatient treatment for counties and communities to also have access to some grants to facilitate that as long as they also were -- so those community behavioral health clinics would get those -- to also help for those who are cycling through with a history of violence, prison, homelessness, et cetera, those, that small one percent of one percent, or persistent chronically and mentally ill and going through this system. One thing is I want to make sure and find out from you is the way this was designed is to make sure that only those counties that really have AOT would be eligible for those grant programs if they're going to attach those to those community health centers. Is that something that you are aware of, and could you work with us to make sure that those grant programs are available in that sense?

BURWELL: We do want to work with you on that and, yes, we are working on that and we would like to work with you to make sure that we do have the standards in place.

MURPHY: Thank you.

Another one has to do with a program that was discussed by SAMHSA (ph) which is called I-CARE (ph) which is to help with those going into emergency rooms to deal with those in crisis. One of the concerns I have and certainly we have seen headlines and tragic sad cases such as that with Virginia Senator Creigh Deeds and his son Gus. The problems that there are thousands of times that this occurs in this country every year where there's just simply aren't enough psychiatric hospital beds.

And so, people languish in emergency rooms, often in a five point tie-down and given chemical sedatives until a room opens up. It could be hours or days, or weeks in some cases. We wouldn't have this problem if we had more psych beds. And so, I'm hoping that since the demand for psychiatric beds exceeds the current supply of inpatient psychiatric beds, is that something else that you can work as in legislation to say we ought to have a place for those in crisis to get stabilized and not go to jail, not sit in a jail cell and languish there, or sit in an emergency room. But work with us on that -- would you be willing to work with some of that too?

BURWELL: Yes.

MURPHY: Thank you.

BURWELL: Looking forward to that.

MURPHY: And another issue then related to the Assisted Outpatient Grant Program is a standalone thing. I want to show you, I think I have a poster here of -- I just want to show you some of the outcome measures.

This comes out of a Duke University study. When you have assisted outpatient treatment -- so working with someone from the court or judge, working with the person saying you need to stay in treatment for a number of months, outpatient treatment, not inpatient, take your medication and see this person, or report back like with a mental health court or something, they saw an 87 percent reduction in incarcerations, and 83 percent reduction in arrest, 77 percent reduction psychiatric inpatient hospitalizations, and a 33 percent reduction in ER hospitalizations.

So I just want to show that too. And by the way costs are cut in half for these folks too. But it is one in that -- and working with the issues of CBO scoring et cetera, we're really going to have to, I think, team up together in this and say there ought to be some options for people to be in outpatient care. And this is psychiatry, psychology, peer support, social workers, people helping with job training, housing, all those things together. But there has to be this coordination program. Would you work with us on this too?

BURWELL: We will. And I think it's part of the broader issue of delivery system reform and how we deliver quality. You're focused in a very important in mental health. When we look at diabetes and the clinics that I've visited across the country, when we get these adherence numbers up and people participating and that usually has to do with coordinated care and the type of interaction and communication you were talking about, we get adherence, we get less of the disease or problem, and we get lower cost because that happen when we have the bad things that go wrong when people aren't adhering.

MURPHY: Yes. It's going to require that different view of things. And I think you may be familiar with the hearing that we had in the Oversight Committee two weeks ago where a GAO report said and identified -- I was amazed by this, a 112 federal agencies and programs scattered across eight departments that deal with mental illness. And they said the Inter-Agency Coordination Program supporting individuals with serious mental illness is lacking.

It was really -- to me it's really dizzying and a sad description of the process here. I hope you will also work with us and it's a work to coordinate these programs. And can I have that assurance from you as well?

BURWELL: We will and we do coordinate -- we coordinate them across the over-arching issue and then within their areas like veterans homelessness and the issues that related -- and so, I want to have the conversation about how we think about and where we can strengthen those things.

MURPHY: Thank you. Let's continue working on that.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield back.

PITTS: The chair thanks the Gentleman.

And I recognize the Gentleman from Oregon Mr. Schrader from Oregon for five minutes for questions.

SCHRADER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you for being here, Madam Secretary.

BURWELL: Thank you.

SCHRADER: Last year healthcare spending grew at this lowest rate on record since 1960. Healthcare pricing inflation is at its lowest rate in 50 years. And ACA has gotten a lot of attribution by CBO from making a big difference in that result.

Have you seen a Republican legislative language that would give us that same result?

BURWELL: We haven't seen a proposal that would continue us on our path with regard to some of the changes that we've put in place.

SCHRADER: Seniors have also benefitted dramatically from the ACA. Prescription drug costs are a big issue for them. Eight million, over eight million seniors have actually benefitted from and saved over $11 billion, as I understand it, on prescription drugs since the enactment of the ACA.

Is there a Republican proposal out there that does a similar thing?

BURWELL: We haven't seen a proposal about that would take care of this issue, the doughnut hole. And actually on Tuesday we actually were able to update our numbers in that space. And it is now $15 billion in terms of the savings, and on average in the country that's about $1,600 per senior.

SCHRADER: I find that ironic that my colleagues on the other side of the aisle keep asking for a contingency plan from the administration on this bogus lawsuit.

And yet, you know, as a firm believer in Article I Legislative Supremacy, with all due respect, Madam Secretary. I think it's our responsibility and the majority of the party controls both chambers, and -- where the heck is their contingency plan?

That's a rhetorical question, Madam Secretary. . One of the things that's been really good, I think, in my state is the expansion of the Affordable Care Act into the Medicaid population into the private sector. We've had some unqualified success. Emergency room visits are down by 21 percent. We've actually gotten hospital admissions complications from diabetes alone down 9 percent not to mention other diseases. COPD, Chronic Obstructive Pulmonary Disease, hospital stays down almost 50 percent. Are you getting any of the same -- those same types of results from other states? What...

BURWELL: So, we are in - recently actually in the last two weeks out of the State of Kentucky we have seen a piece of analysis done by the University of Louisville and Deloitte and that piece of legislation -- that piece of analysis showed, they did it at the beginning of the expansion and then they did that analysis now.

And what the analysis showed is that the expansion will contribute to 40,000 jobs in the State of Kentucky and will contribute to their GDP by $30 billion and that's at the period up to 2021, so that is over a period of time. But we are starting to see both the economic and job impacts as well as some of the health impacts that you were describing.

SCHRADER: Well, contrary to popular demagoguery in right wing radio and TV, this is a marketplace system we set up federal government as the facilitator in that, the state hopefully those -- some of the state exchanges are also facilitator.

Like everyone I think here, we all believe in the power of marketplace competition. My own state for instance over the last year instead of seeing the double digit increases in insurance premiums on average, ours actually stayed level or decreased slightly. Now, that to me is a key indicator for the, you know, working or non-working the Affordable Care Act, our uninsured rate in Oregon went down 63 percent. I've had testimonials from hospitals and doctors about how people actually have health care access at this point in time. Could you talk about what you see nationally in increased competition?

BURWELL: So, with regard to the issue of increased competition, we saw 25 percent more issuers come into the marketplace this year and so more issuers means more plans and competition.

SCHRADER: It means they wouldn't be doing this if they weren't making some money at this and the program wasn't working, Madam Secretary.

BURWELL: And so -- and also with regards to the issue of competition, what we know is in many plans that are employer-based plans; people do not come in and shop. They just automatically reenroll. And as you know, we have that as part of the marketplace this year.

But we know that actually the majority of people came in and shopped and that I think is related to the competition and it's related to a consumer who wants to make the best choice, and that choice sometimes based on benefit, that choice sometimes based on cost and cost has a number of different elements whether that's premium or deductible.

SCHRADER: Great.

BURWELL: But we are seeing more players come in and we're also seeing the consumer behave in a way that's indicative that they want that competition in shopping.

UNKNOWN: I'd like to call out some kudos on the GME increase in the budget, the money you put in for Medicare appeals back home. We do a lot of work, of course with people having trouble navigating the system big time and the investment in primary care docs, I think that's important. A quick little comment on -- the only thing I'm a little concerned about is if we're going to bundle payments and increased competition why we are hammering on the Medicare Advantage plans a little bit?

BURWELL: As I mentioned to your colleague I think what we're trying to do is balance making sure that those plans are good and strong and we've seen that over the period of the changes we've done. We try and do the changes in a measured way that gets to things that actually have to do with what we believe is strong representation of the taxpayer in terms of places where we believe there are issues like upcoding that is occurring and that MedPAC (ph) has articulated those and others. We always want to listen in here and we want to watch carefully if we're seeing problems that occur with the changes but to date we haven't.

SCHRADER: Thank you. And I yield back.

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman. And I recognize the Gentleman from New Jersey Mr. Lance five minutes for questions.

LANCE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary regarding King versus Burwell, understand what you had said that there can be no administrative action should the plaintiff win the case. You've stated that explicitly and repeatedly and that is not my question. My question relates back to the Chairman who said in his opening line of questioning that we have a specific source within your department that there is a document related to what HHS might do should the Supreme Court rule against the administration.

I understand that your point of view is that there can be no administrative action. You have stated that explicitly. Are you aware of any such document and I'm not asking about your position on administrative action. I'm asking about a document in this regard.

BURWELL: Congressman, I would -- if there is this document and you know of it, I would -- I would certainly like to know of the document because I don't have knowledge of a 100-page document.

LANCE: I didn't say 100-page now did I? I said a document. I don't know how many pages it is. You're not aware of any document?

BURWELL: What I have -- as I've said there isn't administrative action (inaudible).

LANCE: Yes, I don't -- I made that clear that I understand your point of view on that. Is there a document as to a reaction from HHS should the case be won by the plaintiff in the Supreme Court?

BURWELL: With regard to a reaction as I've said because I've articulated that I want to be careful because I have articulated (inaudible)...

LANCE: As I have tried to be careful.

BURWELL: ... the problems with regard to the question of what will happen. We know how many people are in the marketplace, how many (inaudible).

LANCE: Yes, that's filibustering. I understand that. I'm asking whether there is any document. We have a source indicating there is a document as to what might be the response from HHS.

BURWELL: I'm not familiar with the document you're referring to.

LANCE: And let me say that a former CMS administrator Tom Scully of, I believe, the Bush administration has said that, "Of course they have a document." He said, of course, they have one. I think he referred to a document. "They should all resign if they don't." I would hope that your department, Madam Secretary, would have some sort of contingency plan should the court rule for plaintiff. Do you believe that the suit is bogus?

BURWELL: With regard to the lawsuit as I've said what I believe is that the law is clear...

LANCE: Yes, I understand that. You believe the suit is bogus?

BURWELL: That's the characterization I -- my point about the suit is what I believe is that we hold the right position in the (inaudible).

LANCE: I understand that and it will be argued next week and a decision will be made by the end of June. Formerly, when I asked questions about this not from you but regarding prior officials, there was the impression that it was a frivolous suit. Do you believe the suit is frivolous or bogus?

BURWELL: What I believe is that we should continue making progress for the American people on three things that the Affordable Care Act (inaudible).

LANCE: Yes, I'm aware of that. Do you believe the suit is frivolous or bogus?

BURWELL: May I finish, Congressman? I believe that we as the executive branch and the legislative branch should be working together on three things we agree with. That's affordability, access and quality.

LANCE: I agree with all of that.

BURWELL: What I would like -- and what can -- would hope that we can do is build on the progress that we have seen. And that progress is that 11.4 million people...

LANCE: You're claiming my time. Do you believe that the Supreme Court is likely to rule unanimously on this decision?

BURWELL: As I've indicated we believe that the court will rule in our favor.

LANCE: Do you believe the suit is bogus or frivolous?

BURWELL: With regard to characterization, what I think is valuable is that we believe that our position is the position that will stand and that we believe we're right. The people in the State of New Jersey should not have their subsidies taken away be they do or don't have a marketplace when people right across the border in New York will get those subsidies.

LANCE: I believe, Madam Secretary, in equal justice under law as is inscribed across the street in the Supreme Court building, I believe this is a very serious case. I think it's closely contested. Under no circumstances do I believe that plaintiff will win nine to nothing. I think there are good arguments on both sides. I have read the briefs, all of the briefs. I've read the Solicitor General's brief. I've read the brief of the plaintiff. I think it's a very serious case and you and I may disagree on the case. I respect that and I understand that.

It's frustrating to me that here in Washington, there cannot be an intellectual argument as to pros and cons and I certainly would encourage the administration to have a contingency plan and to work with us in Congress including the Republican majority in both the House and the Senate should the court rule for plaintiff.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

BURWELL: Congressman, with regard to the question of our authorities, what you just ended with was the issue of legislation and I want to make sure that I touch on that. As we have said all along we are willing and look forward to working with the Congress on any legislation that would work on those three things we talked about -- affordability, access and quality and preserves the economy as supports working middle class. That's how we look at legislation. We want to do that now and we want to do that (inaudible).

LANCE: And I was part of a group that had an alternative piece of legislation that didn't see the light of day put forth by the Tuesday lunch group of whom I'm a member of that group. It was different from the Affordable Care Act but it was an alternative piece of legislation and, of course, it didn't see the light of day in any way, shape or form in 2009 and 2010.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman.

I now recognize the Gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Kennedy five minutes for questions.

KENNEDY: Thank you. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, thank you very much for being here. You touched on a moment ago that legislation that you said you were eager to work with Democrats and Republicans, have you seen any such legislation?

BURWELL: With regard to legislation that would promote and move forward on those three things, the issues of the -- making sure we're expanding that insured population, I have not seen things that would work towards that.

KENNEDY: Madam Secretary, are you aware of how many bills were passed and signed -- bills that were passed by the 113th Congress?

BURWELL: I don't know the exact number.

KENNEDY: Give or take a few, 931, ballpark sounds about right.

UNKNOWN: That was one and a half (inaudible). KENNEDY: Any idea on how many of those bills were signed into law, 296 sounds about right. Any idea how many times in my first term in Congress we repealed all or part of the Affordable Care Act, 55 sounds about right. Any idea how many times those were signed into law?

BURWELL: None.

KENNEDY: Any times -- are you aware of how many times we voted on some sort of replacement bill to the Affordable Care Act that we voted to repeal 55 times to provide Americans with quality, affordable access and financial assistance to access the health care that they deserve? None.

BURWELL: I think the number is none.

KENNEDY: OK. I would agree with you. So, I think given all of the discussions we've had over the course of the past several hours about contingencies, about other options and the time that I have been in Congress over 55 times in my first term including another time in my second term to repeal all or part of the Affordable Care Act and under the time that I've been here on a Republican leadership not a single bill have seen the House floor to vote on an alternative to provide quality, affordable accessible health care to millions of Americans, I would respectfully ask as my colleagues have for the administration to work with Democrats and republicans to work on any such legislation should they decide to bring that to the light of day.

BURWELL: And in our budget I would just like to mention we actually do have a proposal to improve the small business provisions of the Affordable Care Act to try and both simplify and make the tax credits better for small businesses. That's feedback we've received about that and that is something that is included in our budget.

KENNEDY: Now, turning to a couple of I think hopefully more substantive questions that I could get it with you, Madam Secretary. I was pleased to see that the Democratic (inaudible) Authorization bill that the president's budget was -- included in the president's budget extended the Medicaid primary care payment increase.

That rate of increase was -- that it was initially included in the ACA has been absolutely critical and for the last two years it's boosted payments to doctors who treat the most vulnerable populations making access an attainable goal no just an aspirational target.

According to our recent report from the Urban Institute, however, the expiration of that payment (inaudible) at the end of last year will result in Medicaid provider payments that are going to be cut on average of 43 percent and over 50 percent in some states. The impact on wait times could be drastic and immediate.

I was hoping, Madam Secretary, you might be able to comment on the importance of the parity between Medicare and Medicaid payment to our primary care providers and when they have to choose between seeing some of our most vulnerable populations like seniors, pregnant women and children, why would there possibly be a reimbursement discrepancy.

BURWELL: So, I think as your indicating why we have proposed the continuation of these payments is because we believe that it is making a difference and it's making a difference to the access and coverage that people are getting in the system.

And so, we proposed it as a continuation and we hope that that's something that the Congress will consider and support.

KENNEDY: Thank you. The second topic that I want to touch on today actually my colleague Mr. Murphy touched on it quite extensively in his comments but it's about substance abuse and mental health.

Back in Massachusetts, Madam Secretary, I see communities on the front lines of a growing and extraordinarily devastating opiate abuse crisis and we're looking to the federal government for some support as prescription drug abuse and a number of heroin overdoses continue to mount.

Madam Secretary, as a prosecutor before I ran for office, I saw the impacts of this on a daily basis not just in terms of addiction and people needing treatment but in terms of property crimes, personal crimes for folks that are looking to try to find a way to get help but the treatment options just aren't there.

There are not enough doctors. There are not enough beds as Mr. Murphy indicated. There's not enough wrap-around services. There's not enough care. And I was hoping that you might be able to touch on the importance of actually creating these incentives through Medicaid largely which is our largest mental health provider to actually make sure that not just another grant program but to make sure the incentives are in place to allow that marketplace to provide that care.

BURWELL: So, the bad news as you indicated there were 259 million prescriptions for pain killers, opioids during 2012. That's more than more than one per adult in the nation. That's the bad news. The good news is that I believe that there is bipartisan support for us to do something and I believe that that's both in the executive and the legislative branch here in Washington D.C. as well as with the governors who I met with over the weekend on this issue.

I think with regard to payment it is an important place but there are three fundamental things that we believe we need to work with the Congress and work with the governors to do. One is in terms of the prescribing that's at the root of much of the problem. We've seen progress in states like Florida where they are watching the prescribing, the plans that states can put in place to oversee that is an important part but we have a part, too.

Second is the issue of things like naloxone and access to those which I think gets to some the payment issues. And the third is making sure there's medical treatment and I think that was the third part of what you're mentioning.

Those three elements, I think is base -- that's the basic agreed upon and whether it's Senator Portman and Senator Wyden or Mr. Rogers (ph) or it's across the board there's bipartisan support because states from Massachusetts to Kentucky and West Virginia, my own home state, are suffering in devastating ways.

And the one piece you didn't mention which -- you know, is the economic impact. And having come from a large employer like Walmart, what it means in terms of having an employee (inaudible) that can pass a drug test.

KENNEDY: Thank you, Madam Secretary.

BURWELL: Thank you.

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman.

The Chair will note that we've just been joined by a group of students from the Houston area. The Ranking Member has informed me. You want to say anything, Gene?

GREEN: Mr. Chairman, I would like to recognize a number of our chiropractic students from the Houston area and Dr. Mossad (ph) who actually retired as a president of our Chiropractor College in Pasadena Texas. And I invited him last night because I wanted to show how health care policy is made in the Health Care Subcommittee. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

PITTS: Thank you. You're certainly welcome to be here.

The Chair now recognizes the Gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Griffith five minutes for questions.

GRIFFITH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate that. I appreciate the students being here. We may have some disagreements today but I will tell you that the Ranking Member, Mr. Green and I worked very hard on the health care bill that was -- that was signed into law last year. So, no matter what you may see today, we do get along more often than the press let you know.

All right, that being said, Madam Secretary, in response to a previous question, you indicated you weren't aware of any of the laws being signed in. I'm sitting here with the CRS report -- Congressional Research Service -- indicating that there are 12 bills that repealed parts of Obamacare that were in fact signed into law. You're not aware of that, is that correct in relationship to your previous answer.

BURWELL: With regard to the specifics to the answer those were repeal questions I thought.

GRIFFITH: Yes. And this was part...

BURWELL: Full repeal. Full repeal (inaudible).

GRIFFITH: ... he said -- he said full or part. So, you were mistaken, you weren't aware of these 12 that were partially repeals.

BURWELL: I was referring to the issue of full repeal (ph).

GRIFFITH: But you were aware of this?

BURWELL: With regard to that, I'd have to look and see (inaudible).

GRIFFITH: OK. And if I could have this entered into the record, I'd appreciate it.

PITTS: Without objection, so ordered.

GRIFFITH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Also, are you familiar with my H.R. 130?

BURWELL: I apologize. I don't know what that bill is. Maybe if it's described I might (inaudible).

GRIFFITH: And are you -- it's a bill that deals with the black lung provisions of Obamacare.

BURWELL: I'm not familiar with that.

GRIFFITH: I appreciate that. Are you familiar with my H.R. 790 which is the Compassionate Freedom of Choice Act?

BURWELL: I'm not familiar with the specific names of the legislation (inaudible).

GRIFFITH: And I appreciate that. And are you familiar with H.R. 793 which deals with Preferred Pharmacy Networks in Part D?

BURWELL: Depending on (inaudible) that may.

GRIFFITH: Another one of mine. And so, the reason I asked those questions is very well orchestrated today from my political standpoint, the other side of the aisle has asked you repeatedly are you aware of Republican legislation that deals with the issues that we're dealing with related to Obamacare, I would submit to you that in some way or another the three points that you pointed out, each one of those bills did, you're not intimately familiar with them and I understand that. And I'm not blaming you because you've been put into that unenviable position that sometimes happens where there's a difference between negative evidence and a lack of evidence.

And what you presented today is a lack of evidence and I appreciate that. That doesn't mean that these bills don't exist just as I gave you the numbers on those three. It doesn't mean that there aren't bills that other members have that are out there that are Republican proposals to take care of the American citizen while we are in the process of repealing Obamacare. And so, you're just submitting that you are not aware of it. But there are in fact bills out there that may be doing that ad also further discussions behind the scenes that may be doing that you're unaware of. Isn't that correct?

BURWELL: Would welcome the Veterans Bill -- there was a Veterans Bill that we all agreed on. The firefighters I haven't seen the legislation.

GRIFFITH: I'm just saying though that when you say -- when you say though in answer to many number of members on the other side of the aisle that you aren't aware that doesn't mean they don't exist. It just means you're not aware, am I correct? Yes.

All right. We'll move on. The president's fiscal year 2016 budget calls for $92 million for the Office of National Coordinator, ONC, for purposes including the transition to a governance approach for health information exchange.

In 2012, an HHS request for information noted that Congressional authorities granted to the ONC in the 2009 HITECH Act would support this governance mechanism. Madam Secretary, I hold in my hand the copy of a Congressional research report dated January 7, 2015 that suggests ONC does not have the authority to support the ONC governance structure outlined in the president's budget. Don't you agree that when agencies take action, they should be supported by Congressional authorization?

BURWELL: I'm not familiar with the report, would welcome seeing it. With regard to the Office of the National Coordinator, I think you know we just came out with the plan to continue moving us towards electronic medical records. We backed that up with specific things. We continue to work on something that cuts across many of the issues and whether (inaudible).

GRIFFITH: But you would agree with the principle that there ought to be Congressional authority for an agency to take action, would you not, yes or no?

BURWELL: I would agree that we need authority.

GRIFFITH: Yes, ma'am.

And. Mr. Chairman, if I can also have that Congressional research service report placed into the record (inaudible).

PITTS: Without objection, so ordered.

GRIFFITH: As a part of its governance push, ONC awarded a contract to RTI (ph) to develop its health IT safety center. RTI said at the time of the award that it would define the focus, functions, governance and value the national health IT safety content. I'm just concerned as I pointed out a minute ago that when you have these comments being made and we haven't seen it yet and the report that I just had entered into the record shows they haven't seen the final analysis of what they're going to do.

But when you have comments that they're planning to work on governance and they don't have that authority, I am concerned when the experts are telling me both legal and otherwise that this agency is going beyond its scope of authority, that this is a problem in this administration and that we should be careful that we have any agency moving forward without Congressional authority. I'm going to ask you to work with me as we -- as we move forward on this. I'm going to follow up with some questions and some other things and ask that you work with me to make sure that the ONC does not overstep its authority granted to it in legislation by this Congress.

BURWELL: Would want to work with you to understand and understand what these concerns on governance are. This is new to me and so would like to understand further what the concern is.

GRIFFITH: Yes, ma'am. And I appreciate that and I yield back.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman.

I now recognize the Gentlelady from California, Ms. Capps five minutes for questions.

CAPPS: I thank my colleague for yielding any time and I do have a different topic to discuss with you, Secretary Burwell. But my colleague from Texas has asked for 10 seconds.

UNKNOWN: I'll do my 10 seconds. I want to thank the Congressman from Virginia. But I think the clarification is that up until Congressman Kennedy, all our statements were repeal the Affordable Care Act without an alternative. Now, there were bills that were passed and none of us at least up until Congressman Kennedy.

BURWELL: That's right.

UNKNOWN: But, you know, there's no repeal and replace. There's only repeal for (inaudible) 56 times. And thank you for my 10 seconds.

BURWELL: And that's why I responded to full repeal. It was...

CAPPS: Thank you. You know, I want to go back to the president's budget this year which I think on the whole strikes an important balance between controlling spending and promoting public health. And this public health topics are what I want to bring to your attention. I was pleased to see that there was continued support for nursing work force development. I believe and I know you do, too, a strong nursing work force improves the health of our communities as well as the quality of the health care system.

And we now have the significant challenge in our nation of caring for a growing patient population with limited resources. And I'm a nurse so I know that we can't reach our health care goals without a strong health care workforce made up of a range of health care professionals.

And these are the development programs such as Title VIII that are proven to be a solution that can help address this challenge. So, would you please discuss briefly because I have two more topics what this budget request does to make sure that we have a diverse health care workforce well equipped and large enough to meet our needs. BURWELL: I will just be very brief...

CAPPS: Sure.

BURWELL: ... which is I think one of the core and anchor places that we do that is making sure that we are funding our national health service corps and the increases that we've asked for are very important part of that across, and it's especially important because we serve that group of people, 30 percent are diverse in that group.

CAPPS: Yes.

BURWELL: And in the nation as a whole, the number is 10 percent so we are over-indexing for that and that we think that's a very (inaudible).

CAPPS: Right (ph).

BURWELL: (inaudible) there are other things but I want (inaudible).

CAPPS: Right. And because this one that I'm going to mention is near and dear to my heart and that is the Maternal, Infant, and Early Childhood Home Visiting Program, such bang for the buck that you get with this who have ever seen it and I -- as I have and part of one. It's such a proactive and preventive service and there is an increasing commitment in this home visiting program in the budget for 2016. These are evidence based, as you know, bipartisan programs helping to ensure that all children across the board get an opportunity to be healthy and successful.

And they are so critical to improving health outcomes for both women and children and families. So my question is how increased funding for these programs is going to address disparity and improve the health. How can we make it better?

BURWELL: So with regard to the issue because I am a mother of a five and a seven-year-old I have lived the importance of that information very recently in terms of being able to give your children what they need. And so the program that you're describing why we think it's important to continue on the pace, it is an evidence-based program.

CAPPS: Yeah.

BURWELL: We have seen the results in terms of reading and other analytical skills up to 12 years old in terms of the benefits that's as far as it's been tested. And we see what that's happening when we give mothers and parents that opportunity to get the information they need in a home (ph). When you go to them, it is making the difference.

And so, we believe this is a very important part and part of a continuum that you see in the budget. That home visiting, next comes to that early childcare and making sure that we fund childcare so working Americans can be a part of that and then the issues of Head Start and improving Head Start both in terms of the length of day, the time of year and the quality that we require. So it is continuum in terms of making sure we're taking care of those children along the way for working families and pressing ourselves to improve quality.

CAPPS: And to build on that in the focus on children and family. This question was asked about graduate medical education, but I want to focus on children's hospital GME because children's hospitals programs are so critical for training pediatricians, pediatric specialists and pediatric researchers.

It's less than one percent of hospitals. They train 51 percent of all pediatric specialists and the Children's Hospital Graduate Medical Education Programs currently receive much less funding than other, you know, children don't lobby.

And we have to do this work on their behalf and would explain the proposed changes to funding for Children's Hospital Graduate Medical Education Programs and what steps are being taken to ensure that we are meeting the demand for pediatric care.

BURWELL: We want to meet that demand and we want to meet that demand for both primary care and the specialties where we don't necessarily have the number of practicing physicians that we need.

And so, the proposal that we have tries to respond to the criticisms that we received last year with our proposal and that there is a $100 million that is dedicated firmly to the children's programs.

In addition to that, they are able to compete. Right now, what we do is we cover the direct costs but we don't continue to cover the indirect cost.

CAPPS: Thank you very much.

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentlelady.

I now recognize the Gentleman from Texas Dr. Burgess for five minutes for questions.

BURGESS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Again, Madam Secretary, my apologies for being out of the hearing at another hearing. And I also apologize for not having the president's here with me this morning.

But the president did outline a number of savings in the Medicare space in the presidential budget. Is that correct? Do I understand that correctly?

BURWELL: Yes. That is correct.

BURGESS: And in general, as the head of HHS, are you supportive of those proposals by -- in the president's budget?

BURWELL: Yes. BURGESS: Let me ask you a question then, you know that one of the things -- I mean, I have just been pounding my head against the wall for 12 years on the sustainable growth rate formula. We're very close last year.

We almost crack them up, but we didn't quite get there. But I thought we had a good proposal and we're very close to introducing the same policy language again in this Congress. Offsets (ph) have been -- have been difficult as everyone would expect.

So let me just ask you, those savings that the president identified -- those Medicare savings that the president identified in the presidential budget, do you think it would be a good idea to apply those savings for the permanent repeal of the sustainable growth rate formula?

BURWELL: With regard to how we pay for it in the president's budget, we pay for it -- it is within the baseline and we include it that way. With regard to the specific question of just using our approach to the Medicare, those savings are part of a broader context.

It is a budget and we put the budget together in its entirety. We view that those savings need to be paired with other elements of the budget.

BURGESS: But to the extent that those savers are identified, and those offsets are identified in the budget, it seems to me that is -- would perhaps be a reasonable place to begin the discussion of what are the offsets that are used to put in place for the permanent universal, complete, forever repeal of the sustainable growth rate formula.

BURWELL: First, I want to disagree with the content that we're talking about. In my opening remarks, I specifically said that we support the bipartisan bicameral concepts that were put forward. And so, on that we agree.

With regard to the question of offsets, why I started with how we do it, which is building it into the baseline is because that's the way we believe it should be done and that uses the balance of things that we use to pay for things in our entire budget.

So in terms of where we start and what we believe, we believe that it needs to be a range of things and not simply focused on those.

BURGESS: Yes, but at the same time, as you know, the difficulty with the sustainable growth rate formula is the budget baseline and the fact that it was built in years ago and it accumulates over time isn't ever corrected even though a number of patches (ph) have been passed by Congress, we basically paid for this damn thing at least 1.4 times over the past 12 years.

BURWELL: (inaudible) -- yes.

BURGESS: Again, I just want you to know that I like the fact that the president put forward cost savers in his budget. A fair warning to you that these are where I am going to go, the lack of participation in people who are willing to come forward and talk seriously about offsets leads me to go to the president's budget as the only place I can go for democratic ideas for an offset.

And that is -- that is one of the critical missing piece in getting this SGR settled. Let me ...

BURWELL: I think your colleague, actually though mentioned -- your colleague Mr. Pallone actually mentioned his specific idea for this one. He spoke to this issue. It was (inaudible), but -- and you may disagree with that, but that was (inaudible) in terms of contributing to the debate.

BURGESS: And my door is always open to Mr. Pallone, I await his invitation. I'll be glad to come to his office. Let me ask you a question. I know -- I know you probably are tired of hearing the King versus Burwell, but I'll bring it up to you one more time, since I haven't been here, it's not exhausting to me yet.

And the whole concept around contingency plans and the American Academy of Actuaries is concerned because insurance companies are supposed to disclose the data upon which they're basing their rates in May, but there could be something that changes the equation in June, so to the extent that the insurance companies are having to deal with this unsettled future, I mean, they are going to have to deal with contingency plans are they not.

Why should the department not have a contingency plan as recommended by the American Academy of Actuaries?

BURWELL: So with regards to things that I have authority to plan for, I will plan for. In the budget -- the current budget you see in front of you, the unaccompanied children issue one that I know is a difficult issue and that there's controversy around. We have put in monies to plan up to 60,000, have asked for contingency funding case.

We don't believe it will, but in case the numbers were there are places that I can plan, we will. With regards to this issue, that's why the letter was simple, it actually gets to the core and the fundamental.

We do not believe we have administrative authority if the court makes a decision and as I went -- I always repeat, we don't believe the court will decide this way, but if the court makes a decision that says and rules for the plaintiffs and says that those subsidies are not available, the question of we don't believe we have an authority to undo the damage that would then occur which is subsidies go away, individuals can no longer pay. They go off of their insurance. They become uninsured. It drives premiums up in that marketplace. They become uninsured. There's indigent care, it goes up.

We don't believe that we have an authority if the court makes that decision at that level that we have an authority to do it and therefore that's why you're not hearing (inaudible) plaintiffs because we don't have an authority. BURGESS: Well, I think you have to agree, it will change the structure of the risk pools for the insurance companies. And Mr. Chairman, for that reason I'd like to submit the letter from the American Academy of Actuaries for the record and I yield back.

PITTS: Without objection, so ordered.

BURWELL: I do think though that is why one does see those companies filing their briefs that they have filed in the case that articulate the point you're making.

PITTS: The Gentleman yields back. The Chair recognizes the Gentleman from Maryland, Mr. Sarbanes for five minutes for questions.

SARBANES: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Madam Secretary. First, thank you for stepping into public service as you've done your tenure at OMB and now at HHS is I think a real service to the country.

I wanted to talk about this concept of full repeal which has been a drumbeat for years it seems now from the other side of the aisle to understand the implications of a full repeal. And so I wanted to go through some of the things that were part of the ACA and ask. And it may not be that every one of them is jeopardized for a full repeal. But I think, certainly, some of them are.

So the ACA included a measure that would allow young people to stay on their parents' health care up to age 26. And I think upwards of 3 million younger adults have benefited from that. If there was a full repeal at the ACA, would that benefit and provision be in jeopardy

BURWELL: It was part of the original act, so yes.

SARBANES: Then there was an effort to begin closing the doughnut hole on prescription drugs under the Part D program, which has bedeviled many of our seniors who kind of fall into that doughnut hole often at a critical stage in terms of being -- needing to access prescription drugs. And the ACA reform included an effort that's began, is under way to close that doughnut hole, would that be in jeopardy if there was a full repeal?

BURWELL: It would in the $15 billion in savings that their seniors have received to date would stop.

SARBANES: Right. Then there was terrific provisions in terms of reimbursement that benefits in reimbursement, so on the benefit side, for Medicare beneficiaries, you had more preventive care being covered fully, eliminating copayments for certain kinds of preventive care, screening for annual wellness visits, et cetera. That was part of the ACA. A full repeal, I imagine, would jeopardize that reform as well.

BURWELL: Yes. And we actually just were able to have the numbers. And we have seen an increase in the number of seniors that are using that preventative care and the percentage of seniors that are using at least one preventative service continues to go up. SARBANES: Excellent. We put in some enhanced payment in reimbursement for primary care physicians recognizing that we need to make sure we're incentivizing that part of the profession in terms of getting into the pipeline. And also, having the opportunity to spend more time with their patients and having there be some economic reward for that, which the patients themselves also want, I presume that that would -- that would be imperiled with a full repeal as well.

BURWELL: A full repeal would imperil.

SARBANES: What about the provisions that have eliminated discrimination based on preexisting conditions, of course, we started right out of the gate eliminating that discrimination in the case of children, now that's been expanded more broadly. But I imagine that also would be undermined by a full repeal.

BURWELL: It would and having had the chance to meet a young woman who had cancer when she was seven -- when she was 12-years-old, she first had colon cancer and then had thyroid cancer later. And now is in her 20s and was engaged, but not continuing her graduate education or getting married because her focus was paying for her health care. And now the opportunity to have affordable care, because she had a preexisting condition, obviously, is now allowing her to go on with her life.

The issues of health security are very important, but for many individuals, the financial security is as well.

SARBANES: Thank you for those comments. The medical loss ratio requirement that now requires insurance plans to direct more of the insurance premium dollar to care as opposed to overhead cost and so forth, that was part of the ACA, adhering to that particular standard, that would be eliminated. I (inaudible) expecting a full repeal.

BURWELL: A full repeal.

SARBANES: Subsidies and tax credits for small businesses who want to do the right thing and provide health care coverage for their employees was part of the ACA, so small businesses would be impacted by a full repeal in terms of their ability to offer that kind of benefit to their workers. Isn't that correct?

BURWELL: It would take away the tax credits if there were a full repeal.

SARBANES: So even before we get to a discussion of the pros and cons of the health exchanges, which have now offered a coverage to millions of Americans. There are so many other reasons in addition to that that we wouldn't want to repeal the Affordable Care Act.

Thank you very much for being here. I appreciate your testimony.

BURWELL: (inaudible).

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman. I recognize the Gentleman from Florida, Mr. Bilirakis for his questions. BILIRAKIS: (inaudible) so much for your testimony. Thanks for your appearance. Welcome. I want to talk about Medicare Advantage. According to 2012 data, there were about 145,000 seniors in my district, about 40 percent of them are on Medicare Advantage, a little higher than the national average.

They love their plans and they want to keep their plans. They love their benefits and their choices. Unfortunately, this administration may not love Medicare Advantage as much as my seniors.

This -- the actuarial firm of Oliver Wyman did an analysis of the proposed 2016 Medicare Advantage rate notice, reading the report I'm troubled to learn that it estimates the combined impacts of cuts from 2014 to 2016 will cost seniors on an average of $60 to a $160 a month or as much as $1,920 a year.

Many of the seniors in my district live on a modest income, fixed income. Why is the administration forcing many seniors to pay more than $100 a month to keep the plan they like?

BURWELL: So with regard to the issue of Medicare Advantage, first I want to say, we think the program is a good program. During the period when changes have been enacted, we've seen the program expand by, I think well over 40 percent. We've seen the number of Medicare Advantage plans that have the top two ratings go from 17 percent to 67 percent and we have seen that premiums have not been increasing in terms of the changes that we've done to date.

Why are proposing these changes is they have been recommended by MedPAC and others with regard to overcoding that's occurring and as part of our efforts to make sure we're using the taxpayer dollar wisely, we want to promote the program. We want to keep the program healthy, but we also believe that there are opportunities for those who may be not using the system as well as they might. And that's what our changes are about and that's what we're trying to do, preserve and build the system, but make sure we do it in a fiscally responsible way.

BILIKARIS: Thank you, Madam Secretary. Many seniors who like the Medicare Advantage program they have are going to lose it in the following years. In fact, a recent (inaudible) report details a nearly fourfold increase in the number of U.S. counties that no longer have Medicare Advantages as an option growing from 55 counties in 2012 to 211 counties in 2015.

Isn't it concerning to you that seniors are losing the ability to choose a Medicare plan that provides high quality in coordinated care? This is a very successful program and again this is extremely important to my constituents.

BURWELL: I agree that it is a very important program and we want to make sure that it continues. When I see the studies and the underpinning of that, the most recent numbers that I have seen are that 99 percent of beneficiaries have access. And so, those numbers may not align with that most recent study. I just want to understand what the difference in that is. BILIKARIS: Thank you, Madam

Secretary. One more question. The impact of seniors of Medicare Advantage according to Oliver Wyman could result in seniors losing access to their current coverage or facing higher premiums, reduced benefits and changing, again, changes to the network as a result of the cuts, the proposed cuts.

When I talk with seniors in my district about Medicare Advantage, again, they believe Medicare Advantage, the model offers high quality coordinated care. Yet, further cuts will disrupt the benefits upon which millions of seniors rely.

Your agency likes to tout the so-called the affordable premiums and better consumer choices under the Affordable Care Act, when it comes to Medicare Advantage wise administration pursuing policies that would increase premiums and reduce choices for seniors and again, it's very concerning.

BURWELL: I think the responses with regard to the issue that what we have seen with the changes we've done to date have not had the premium pressure that's described. We want to continue to watch and monitor. And also that we have seen more people enter in and the quality improve. And so, that's what we've seen to date. We want to continue to work and monitor. We want the program to succeed. We want to support it and we want to try and do it in the way that's the most fiscally responsible.

BILIKARIS: Well, thank you, Madam Secretary. I appreciate it.

I yield back, Mr. Chairman.

PITTS: (inaudible) Gentleman. I recognize the Gentleman from California, Mr. Cardenas for five minutes for questions.

CARDENAS: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I appreciate the opportunity to have this public dialogue for the benefit, not only of the members but for the public as well. Preserving access to prescription drugs that work for every senior is important. I think everybody on this dais and I think every person who cares about a senior in this country which probably makes everybody. So my question has to do with what proposals in the president's budget would increase access for seniors?

BURWELL: With regards to the specific access for seniors, across the board on prescription drugs, I think in terms of the programs, whether that's the way we use some of the programs we've just been discussing, but I also think one of the most important things that has happened is that seniors have access to preventative services that they historically may not have.

And just announced on Tuesday that what we are seeing is because the seniors have that access to those preventative services, they're increasing that -- the use of that. I think throughout our budget, one of the things we're attempting to do is work very hard to do a system -- delivery system reform which means getting better quality, at a better price for the nation. And I recently announced about three weeks ago that in the Medicare space, we're going to try and move to 30 percent of all Medicare payments will be in new payment models, payment models that are about improving net quality and reducing net cost. And so those are some of the areas that I think the budget focuses on this.

CARDENAS: Now, that effort, is it likely to create an environment, individual by individual that's likely to increase their quality of extended life versus, because when we're talking about access to preventative care that means that if you catch something at its early stages, we all know with today's modern medicine and opportunities, you can actually thwart it or actually overcome it versus finding something at latent stages, it might even take your life. Correct?

BURWELL: And across the department there are number of investments to get to that. And whether that's the NIH investments in research or in the Center for Innovation in Medicare and Medicaid, one of the things where we have out, a proposal that we're getting response to have to do with hospice and curative care and how to combine those two in a way that will maximize for the quality of the patient. And so, it's throughout the budget, these issues of cost and quality are things that we focus on.

CARDENAS: Thank you. On that note, I'd also like to add, for the record, if you would allow me unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to submit the -- a letter for the record from my office that lays out the issues that we're discussing at the moment.

PITTS: Without objection, so ordered.

BURWELL: Thank you.

CARDENAS: I keep hearing a lot from some of my colleagues about their constituents losing choices. But then again, one of the things that -- it's my understanding, please clarify that when people are talking about losing choices, they may be describing policies that were, in fact, more expensive on the front end and perhaps didn't have minimum benefits standards to the person paying. Is that many cases what people are describing when people are losing choices?

BURWELL: It can be, I would want to understand the specific (inaudible) within the marketplace ...

CARDENAS: And that's why I say the word, "maybe, maybe," yes.

BURWELL: Within the marketplace there are 25 percent more issuers, which mean more choice. The essential health benefits do important things, I think as you're reflecting. And they get to some of the issues that, Mr. Murphy and Ms. Matsui on mental health and having those benefits be clear and incorporated is extremely important. So without understanding the specific case, I think it's a little hard to know.

CARDENAS: But there are, in fact, in some areas where certain kinds of policies are not allowed, but that was -- that is based on a new minimum standard, correct?

BURWELL: That is correct.

CARDENAS: And one of the things that I've discussed with some of my constituents and my staff and some of the providers and experts that we pulled together, we registered at least over 1,000 families.

And I personally tried to speak to as many of those individuals as possible. And with that is many of them were even scared to be there. They were thinking about this big Obamacare dragon that was going to obliterate either their finances or their health care, but what almost a person, every person that got up from once, they sat down and figured out what was available to them or what have you, had a big smile on their face.

And they were very pleased and very relieved and glad they came. And in one instance, I was talking to a Gentleman who was paying $60 a month. He was making $9 an hour, single-income family. He had a wife and a daughter. And I met all three of them.

And when he was done, he had a big smile in his face. He almost got up and left when he met me. But when he was done, he actually realized that he now was able to provide for his family, without having to spend $60 a month and now his entire family has coverage. So I think that's a perfect example of what this is, what's good in the Affordable Care Act.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield back my time.

PITTS: Thanks, Gentleman. I recognize the Gentleman from Indiana, Dr. Bucshon for five minutes for questions.

BUCSHON: Thank you, Secretary Burwell and thanks for coming. And first of all, I want to thank you for working with Governor Mike Pence of Indiana of helping the Indiana Plan 2.0, which will help to cover 350,000 low-income Hoosiers in a state based program that I think has been shown historically to not only save money, but it is very popular with the enrollees, so thank you very much for that -- for that work.

Before I came to Congress, I was a cardio-thoracic surgeon and I treated most of my patients for many weeks after their surgery. And as you probably know that falls on under a global payment, a 90-day global surgical payment by CMS. Now, CMS wants to repeal that rule and eliminate global payments for surgical services, why?

BURWELL: With regard to our understanding of how the global payments are used, the reason that we want to do this is make sure that while we are promoting quality care that we do it in the way that is most cost-effective for the tax payer. Most of the changes that we do in the Medicare space are focused on those two things and trying to balance those two things.

BUCSHON: OK. And has HHS or CMS looked into the administrative cost the new system we'll have on doctors and CMS? The reason I ask is in my practice, I'll give you some examples of how this actually won't work or won't work if you do it. We would bill a global payment for everything including follow up visits and now doctors will be billing for the surgery, every hospital round that they make, every follow up appointment, all separately, let me finish, and not only would the medical practice have to pay employees to submit all of these what I have considered excessive claims, but then, CMS will have to process each claim and how can that not cause CMS more money not less, that's my first question.

BURWELL: With regard to the global payment issue and one of the things Dr. Patrick Conway, we try and have physicians who are practicing at the table as we have these conversations. I want to understand the point that you're making in how we believe - I want to look into this one in terms of the specific answer to your question.

BUCSHON: It will be a dramatic increase. Let me tell you why, if I did an open heart surgery on a patient I would see them in the ICU anywhere from three to five days every day and then, probably two to three follow up appointments. That's all under global. And so now that those numbers will be submitted as individual bills, from a surgeon's perspective I see this is - and I think seniors should be paying attention to these comments. This is going to be a dramatic pay cut for surgeons across this country. And that's -- in my view, that's where any potential savings will be coming from.

So as you look at this you better - you should really - I would encourage you to pay attention to that because what will happen is you're going to have to re-evaluate, there's going to be a re- evaluation of every code, re-evaluation of every follow up appointment, you're going to have to discern whether there's duplicative billing. For example, if I see a patient post-op in the ICU and a critical care physician is also seeing my patient that day, who gets paid, who doesn't get paid, there will be increased denials. My point is this global payments were put in place to save money administratively and also simplify and I think improve quality of healthcare.

And I think going backwards away from that is regressive - regressing backwards. Yes, it will save money, this will save money by dramatically cutting provider reimbursement, and if that's the intent that's unfortunate because what will also result is access issues for seniors for healthcare services and I would argue less quality healthcare. And so, you know, most of these bundles are re- examined every few years by (inaudible) and so, you know, the argument that overbilling is occurring. If that were to be true, then, you know, these bundles are looked at every couple of years and re-evaluated. So, on that subject I would encourage you to take a really hard look at global payments. They save money. They don't cost money. The savings will be at the - on the backs of seniors' access to healthcare and quality in my opinion.

The other thing is the president's budget would seek to save 20.9 billion in savings over the next ten years by strengthening the IPAD (ph) board, a board of unelected members selected by the president to cut - in my view, to cut Medicare payments to providers. I understand the president has not yet nominated, anyone who sits on the IPAD (ph) board, so it would not - you could not recommend a Medicare cuts this year. So, in what year under the president's budget will IPAD (ph) begin to make recommendations on Medicare cost?

BURWELL: In the current president's budget, IPAD (ph) would not kick in until 2019.

BUCSHON: 2019.

BURWELL: That's correct.

BUCSHON: OK. Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

PITTS: The chair thanks the Gentleman. Now, I recognize the Gentleman from New York, Mr. Collins for five minutes for questions.

COLLINS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and thank you, secretary, for being here today. I'm from western New York which is a very rural community. We have one of the highest enrollment of Medicare Advantage.

I know prior to the Affordable Care Act I would say that without a doubt one of the bright spots in the delivery of healthcare in the United States was Medicare Advantage, dealt with the doughnut hole. It was a lot of comfort for the seniors to be able to go in much likely do at HMOs and great program and yet as was brought out earlier I want to get into this.

It seems as though the president and the administration in HSS views Medicare Advantage with some level of distain in that it's the piece that keeps getting cut. And as I look through some of the data and I'm kind of a data driven guy, the interesting thing I found about Medicare Advantage, there's over seven million enrollees who represents almost 30 percent of the Medicare population would indicate get works.

Number two, when you look at who uses it, lower income beneficiaries have a higher enrollment in Medicare Advantage than do wealthier individuals which means it's serving best some of the lower income populations. We've also seen that when I look at the rural plans, again, in rural America, which I represent, a higher percentage of folks from rural America area using it.

So, I'm just asking the question as - and the interesting thing too that that information we got today was from (inaudible), they said the current 0.9 percent, the 0.9 percent cut that's coming now in the subsidy to insurance companies for Medicare Advantage is going to add another $20 a month to beneficiaries either in higher premiums or reduced benefits. Could you speak to just the opinion of older Americans on Medicare that they are being used as the funding source for the extension of Medicaid and all of those increased cost in the back of seniors who depended on this great program through all these years? A frustration level exists within that population.

BURWELL: I appreciate that and as I responded to your colleague with regard to the issues of Medicare Advantage I would say we support the program, I believe the program is a good program, but I also believe that our responsibility where we think there are things that are happening whether that's upcoding or other things that we try and take care of that. The changes that we've done, we've tried to transition those changes. We try to do those changes slowly so that we watch and monitor. We've seen an increase in the number of people in Medicare Advantage. We have seen premiums hold steady, we've seen an increase in quality.

So the negative impacts that were articulated at the beginning of those proposals, we have not seen. We want to continue to monitor and make sure that we don't see some of the negative impacts that you are talking about. We value the program. We think the changes. They've been recommended by MedPac (ph) and others. We understand the concerns, but trying in a world, and with regard to the other issues that you mentioned I would just say across the board and whether it's the issue that your colleague just mentioned with regard to providers or the $780 million we do in discretionary cuts, we try to spread these things across the entire parts of our budget.

COLLINS: But are you aware that there are now over 200 counties in the United States that don't have a Medicare Advantage plan at all to offer their seniors as a direct result of the cuts you've made? So when you say it hasn't had this impact, there are seniors in 200, over 200 counties in the United States that can't even buy the coverage.

BURWELL: So 99 percent of the nation has coverage in terms of the beneficiary's accessibility.

COLLINS: But yet the number who don't has increased from 55 counties before the ACA to over 200 today. So, there's a direct impact, I mean, the numbers, the data is the data, you can't make it go away.

BURWELL: With regard to those numbers as I've said I have the number of the current coverage and would want to understand the change...

COLLINS: Yes, what I'm trying to point out is it has had - the reason you're looking for this funding is to pay for the expansion of Medicaid. I mean, whether it's the health insurance tax or the individual mandate or whatever, the big cost driver has been this huge expansion of Medicaid would be my observation.

BURWELL: What I would observe is some of the comments that have been stated about the question of overall entitlements and the growth, we have a bulge, a population we have a large group of people who are elderly in Medicare. The Medicare cost, even though we've controlled per capita cost for Medicare over the period of what we're seeing, because more people of from the baby boom are retiring and older, that's an issue that we as a nation are going to have to look at and deal with. Medicare costs are going to continue to increase because of volume even if we can control per capita cost.

And so with regard to the questions of what will be costing the nation money over periods of time, the issue of Medicare is one on a - because we're going to have the baby boom and the echo come through, we're going to continue to have to make good on the commitments we've made and that will cost us because even if you control it per capita, volume is greater. COLLINS: Thank you for the answer. My time has expired. I yield back.

PITTS: The chair recognizes the Gentleman from New Mexico, Mr. Lujan for five minutes for questions.

LUJAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman and I would yield to our Ranking Member, Mr. Green for a quick response as well.

GREEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would respond to my colleague from New York. I don't - I've not had any of my seniors question the expansion of Medicaid based on what's happening with Medicare. The Affordable Care Act was totally paid for and, in fact, Medicare was improved under the Affordable Care Act. And Madam Secretary, if you just - this is the first I've heard that seniors are complaining that the Medicaid expansion is being paid out of Medicare. That's just - that's just not, in fact, that I hear about. Did you have any information on that?

BURWELL: That is the first that I've heard that anyone felt that that was an issue with regard to the federal budget, because I assume that's what they're referring to.

GREEN: Yes. The Gentleman would yield...

LUJAN: I'm reclaiming my time. Thank you, Madam Secretary for your testimony today. I want to reiterate what many of my colleagues have said, that we must repeal the SGR but not on the backs of seniors and that a strong CHIP extension must be included with the SGR in March as well.

Also that the Affordable Care Act is working despite in attempt of over 50 Republican repeal attempts. The ACA has had a positive impact on New Mexico, in my home state, in my home district, 25,000 people now have quality affordable health coverage because of the Affordable Care Act, it didn't before. And overall, the numbers of uninsured has declined by 17 percent.

With the law now fully in effect the Americans can never be discriminated against because of pre-existing conditions, women can never be charged more per coverage because of their gender and Americans will never be sold health insurance policies that disappear when they need coverage the most, when they hit those lifetime caps and suddenly coverage just goes away.

I think that it's time that we come together and work to strengthen the law and stop playing political games that will strip millions of Americans of their health coverage that they depend on. As my father would say, enough is enough. Madam Secretary, in your opinion has the Affordable Care Act had a positive impact on places around the country including my home state of New Mexico?

BURWELL: Yes. And I think it has in three areas, affordability, access, and quality. With regard to the issues of quality, you touched upon a number of the areas where I believe there's been an improvement in quality. And those are the fact that people can have their children covered up to 26, the quality that you don't, if you have a pre-existing condition, you can't be kept out or thrown off of your healthcare. The fact if you take your child in for their wellness visit, there isn't co-insurance so you don't have to pay in terms of that preventative care. So, increases in quality, we've also seen increases in quality through partnerships we're doing with physicians and we've seen a 17 percent reduction in harms.

Those are things like infections and falls and hospitals. That's also about saving lives but it's also about money. With regard to the issue of affordability and the progress that we've made on affordability, while we can all still continue to make more, we have in that space and what we've seen is that in the years 2011, '12, '13, we have seen a record in terms of per capita health care cost growth. It's one of the lowest that we've seen on record and we've seen that. That's in the broader marketplace. With regard to the individual market what we've seen is that people, the vast majority, over eight in ten folks in the marketplace can find coverage using a subsidy that is a $100 or less than a month. That's affordability in that marketplace.

With regard to affordability in the taxpayer, CBO estimates pre the Affordable Care Act would have estimated that spending in Medicare would have been $116 billion greater, affordability for the taxpayer.

Lastly, access, the question of access and the fact that 11.4 million people have come through the marketplace this time, but let's even use last year's number where we saw a 10 million person drop in the number of uninsured. So, against the three fundamental measures, that's how I would think about it.

LUJAN: I appreciate, Madam Secretary, thanks for your response there and I do want to raise an issue that's great concern to my constituents and to myself back in New Mexico. It's now been over 18 since the state of New Mexico claimed credible allegations of fraud or their allegations of fraud against 15 behavioral health providers resulting in the eventual closure or replacement by five Arizona behavioral health providers.

This transition and turmoil has raised significant concerns across access to care, especially in light of recent reports that the new providers are financial unstable. In fact, one provider is already pulling out of New Mexico. The recent elected New Mexico Attorney General has also released the audit that led to the suspension and it shows a lack of underlying basis for many of the allegations of fraud.

My staff has had several meetings with CMS and I'm very concerned that we are making progress. When payment suspensions are put into place what can CMS do to ensure states are acting in good faith and what is the CMS doing to stop the reoccurrence of this happening both in New Mexico and other states? And can I have your commitment that we can work together on this particular issue to meet with the delegation?

BURWELL: We do want to work with you on this issue. You know it is one of concern in terms of making sure that people have access to those benefits.

LUJAN: I appreciate that. Thank you very much. I yield back the balance of my time.

PITTS: The chair thanks the Gentleman. I recognize the Gentlelady from North Carolina, Ms. Ellmers for five minutes for questions.

ELLMERS: Thank you. And thank you, Madam Secretary, for being with us today. I'm sorry, do you get some water there? We should get you some water. I do want to address before - because I have three different very different questions to ask you about, but I do want to address the issue of Medicare and our seniors who are concerned. It is my recollection and, you know, there again I'm just going back to history that over $700 billion was taken out of Medicare in order to pay for Obamacare, about 300 billion of that was Medicare Advantage. So the question of whether or not our seniors are concerned about that, I would say yes, they are concerned about that and they want to make sure that they will be able to continue to get the good care that they deserve.

I do want to start off by talking about Medicare reimbursement in relation to the 2 percent sequester cuts that were put in place a number of years ago dramatically affecting our chemotherapy drugs and our other part B drugs. As you know this has this has - this has affected our industry, back in January 14th of 2013 the Office of Management and Budget put out a letter basically asking federal agencies to "use any available flexibility to reduce operational risks and minimize impacts of the agency's core mission and service of the American people" and it goes on.

Some of the adverse things that have happened as a result of the 2 percent cut, over 16 months after CMS started applying the 2 percent cut, we basically ended up with 25 community oncology clinics closing. One of which, a very large clinic in my own district and 75 others merged with hospitals. CMS's own numbers showed that it cost $6,500 more per year per patient on oncology services if they become part of the hospital system versus the clinic setting or outpatient setting and about $650 more out of pocket. How can, you know, why hasn't CMS taken the recommendation of OMB and addressed that situation?

BURWELL: Congresswoman, we agree with you about sequester and in this budget we fully get rid of sequester both on the mandatory side and on the discretionary side. We believe there are other choices that are better choices and so I agree with you, this is not an approach, when you use an approach like this you'd end up doing things like the types of things you're talking about. And so what we want to do is fully replace it and that's what our budget does. We are willing to make other choices in terms of how we get those savings.

ELLMERS: Thank you. And I'll just go on in this - there again, a very important question having to do essentially with our tobacco products. And I - my question for you is do you agree with Mitch Zeller, the director of FDA Center for Tobacco Products that if smokers and I'm going to quote him, "who are otherwise unable or unwilling to quit were to completely switch to smokeless tobacco product it will be good for the public health." Do you agree with the statement?

BURWELL: I would have to understand the context in which he made that statement. With regard to the question, I think, you know, we want to promote the public health, we want to make sure we're doing the right research to understand that and put the right guidelines and regulations to do it.

ELLMERS: Well, thank you for that and I do want to add there that there are no government websites that help promote or, you know, address this issue including CDC, FDA, NIH. It would be helpful again for the public to understand that there are the non-tobacco products available and that this is an approach that we need to make. And I would welcome the ability to continue to work with you and in your office on any way that we can, you know, better help to get that information out and address the need from a scientific basis and using the scientific research that's out there.

I do want to switch gears a little bit to our vaccines and to BARDA. Right now BARDA maintains a stock pile of roughly $1.7 billion worth of pandemic influenza vaccine. This year's budget I believe was about $20 million in order to take care of that stockpile and maintain it. Does the 2016 budget increase that amount and into the future how does BARDA plan on dealing with those issues, especially when we know that we are in our situation where this is - its a very timely issue.

BURWELL: Across the board our budget has worked to do a couple of things with regard to the preparedness, making sure that that vaccine stockpile and that the issues that BARDA handles which are making sure that we have what we have on hand and stock pile and that we have the ability to work with manufacturers to bring new products online where that's appropriate for different types of issues that we as a nation may face, either manmade or otherwise.

But we also have paired that with things in our budget which are about the preparedness in our communities and we've seen that front and center certainly in our own time period. We are implementing the dollars we appreciate from Congress as part of in terms of Ebola that also broader preparedness where we have been given that authority by the Congress.

ELLMERS: Thank you, Secretary Burwell, for being here today. I truly appreciate your input. Thank you.

PITTS: The chair thanks the Gentlelady. That concludes the questions of the members of who are present. I'm sure we'll have lots of follow up and written questions from some of the members. So, we'll get those to you promptly, we ask that you please respond to the questions promptly. I remind the members that they have 10 business days to submit questions for the record and that means they should submit their questions by the close of business on Thursday, March the 12.

Thank you very much, Madam Secretary, for your attendance today and your answers. And without objections the subcommittee is adjourned.

Rep. Lujan Introduces Bill to Support Coordination Among STEM Efforts in States

BYLINE: by MERLY LAPIG, Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 199 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 -- Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., has introduced legislation (H.R. 1081) to "assist coordination among science, technology, engineering, and mathematics efforts in the States, to strengthen the capacity of elementary schools, middle schools, and secondary schools to prepare students in science, technology, engineering, and mathematics."

The bill was introduced on Feb. 25 and has three co-sponsors. Co-sponsors include Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., Steve Pearce, R-N.M., and Tony Cardenas, D-Calif.

The legislation was referred to the House Education and the Workforce Committee.

LUJAN ON DHS FUNDING: ?TIME FOR CONGRESSIONAL REPUBLICANS TO STOP PUTTING THEIR POLITICAL SECURITY AHEAD OF NATIONAL SECURITY';
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 476 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District spoke on the House floor this morning on importance of passing a clean funding bill to prevent the Department of Homeland Security from shutting down. Below are his remarks.

"Mr. Speaker, we are only days away from a shutdown of the Department of Homeland Security. When Republicans took control of the House and Senate they pledged to avoid more government shutdowns. Instead, we've sadly learned that Speaker Boehner and Leader Mitch McConnell went nearly two weeks - two weeks - without talking and their failure to govern has us once again on the brink of a shutdown.

"I have been shocked and disappointed to hear some of my Republican colleagues say that a shutdown of the Department of Homeland Security would not be a serious issue and try to minimize its impact on people, minimize its impact on workers, and even try to minimize its impact on America.

"In my home state of New Mexico, a border state where we have many men and women who proudly serve our country as employees of the Border Patrol, the TSA, and other agencies, getting furloughed or working without a paycheck is a serious issue. If Republicans continue down this path paychecks will stop but rent and mortgages and utility bills for these workers will not.

"Time and again House Republicans have failed to govern, moving only from one crisis to the next. Sadly, the failure to fund DHS is the latest manufactured crisis that will have a real impact on working families in New Mexico and across America, while needlessly putting our national security at risk.

"It's time for Congressional Republicans to stop putting their political security ahead of national security and pass a clean bill. It's time for House Republicans to stop catering to the extreme anti-immigration wing of their party that is willing to sacrifice our nation's security in order to attack DREAMers who are going to college and serving our great nation.

"Mr. Speaker, the eyes of the American people are watching this Republican-led Congress, and so far all they have seen is gridlock and dysfunction.

"Mr. Speaker, the United States Senate is moving forward to fund the Department of Homeland Security. House Democrats are ready to support a clean bill. The only ones standing in the way of preventing a Department of Homeland Security shutdown are House Republicans. For our country's sake let us hope that changes.

"Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House bring up H.R. 861, the clean Department of Homeland Security funding bill that will keep the Department open so it can carry out its mission of keeping the American people safe."

TEXT:

PITTS: The subcommittee will come to order. The Chair will recognize himself for an opening statement.

I would like to thank Secretary Burwell for appearing before the Subcommittee to discuss the administration's FY2016 budget request for the Department of Health and Human Services. Earlier this year, Madam Secretary, you stated that, quote, "The hallmark of effective leadership is instilling a culture of transparency, ownership, and accountability," end quote.

These are all laudable goals and I appreciate your verbal commitment to these principles. However, your Department's actions have failed to adhere to the same standard. For example, we have only heard silence from the White House on how the administration is preparing for an adverse ruling in King v. Burwell.

We did receive a reply from you, and I thank you for that courtesy. But your letter contained no substantive answers to our questions. During your testimony to the Senate Finance Committee, you were again asked about the administration's plans. And, again, you repeatedly declined to provide a direct answer.

And, you know, this is not the transparency that we had hoped for. Understandably, we were very frustrated with Administration witnesses artfully dodging the questions we ask here. And so I'm asking you today, please let your guard down a little and give us direct and complete answers to our questions.

In 2009, the president correctly said, quote, "The real problem with our long-term deficit actually has to do with our entitlement obligations," end quote. Since then we have had the Simpson-Bowles Commission, a supercommittee, sequestration, and a government shutdown, and never once in all this time did the administration propose a plan to get the nation's fiscal House in order by recommending reforms to entitlements.

The 2014 Medicare Trustees Report, which you signed, tells us that Medicare will be bankrupt very soon. We recently had Senator Joe Lieberman and former OMB Director Alice Rivlin here. And they told us much the same. We stand ready to do the hard work of saving and strengthening Medicare. But we need a willing partner.

Once again, the president's budget fails to propose serious entitlement reform. The proposals in the budget related to Medicaid amount to saving just 15 days worth of program spending over the next 10 years. The plan, apparently, is to let Medicare expenditures continue to grow without any of the structural reforms needed to strengthen and save this critical program. And this is not taking ownership.

If we are going to save and strengthen our safety net programs for the most vulnerable, we have to do better than the president's budget. Both parties have to work together. You, we, and the president need to work together to save our entitlement programs to make them sustainable. So we ask that you please work with us.

On another subject, you may also remember that, in early November of last year, we spoke on the phone about why HHS has so far failed to hold California accountable under federal law. As you know, on August 22, 2014, the California Department for Managed Health Care --DMHC, issued a directive mandating that all plans under DMHC authority immediately include coverage for all legal abortions.

This is in direct violation of the Weldon Amendment, a civil rights statute that prohibits federal taxpayer funding for Federal agencies and state or local governments that discriminate because a health care entity does not provide, pay for, provide coverage of, or refer for abortions.

What California is doing is clearly illegal. It is also morally wrong, and violates the fundamental principles of freedom and conscience that our democracy is founded on. And it is your job to stop them, and so far that hasn't happened.

I'll have more to say about this when we get to questions. In the mean time, Madam Secretary, we look forward to your testimony. We hope that you will stay to answer all of our questions, and, with only five minutes of questions per member, we respectfully ask that you keep your answers concise and to the point.

And Dr. Burgess, do you want the remaining time?

BURGESS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It's very kind of you.

And Secretary, thank you for coming to our humble little subcommittee. I am frustrated over the administration's lack of transparency and the ability for Congress to get information that realistically, we've been asking for the last four or five years, but specifically around ACA-created entities -- the Center for Medicare and Medicaid Innovation, the Prevention in Public Health Fund, the Consumer Information -- the Office of Consumer Information and Insurance Oversight and the Patient Center for Outcomes and Research Initiative.

Year after year, they have failed to achieve their mission of reducing health care cost and improving quality. We can't hold them accountable if we don't know how you're spending the dollars, so we, you and I have talked about this. And I do look forward to our responses in being able to finally get that information regarding those agencies under your (inaudible).

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman.

And I recognize the Ranking Member, Mr. Green, five minutes for an opening statement.

GREEN: Good morning and thank you, Secretary Burwell for being here today to discuss the president's FY '16 budget proposal for the Department of Health and Human Services.

The budget is more than a line of items on a page. It's a reflection of the priorities of our country. Our commitment must be to protect the progress that we made and to make strategic investments so that progress will continue in the future.

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the creation of Medicare and Medicaid. Since the Children's Health Insurance Program was created to ensure America's children have insurance, most recently Congress passed the Affordable Care Act, dramatically expanding access to health coverage and high quality care.

The Affordable Care Act took historic steps toward laying the foundation for a better and more efficient health care system and expanding access to cover for millions of Americans for whom it was previously out of reach.

It also took important steps to restore the fiscal solvency of our health care system. According to the most recent estimates by the Congressional Budget Office, the Affordable Care Act will reduce the deficit by more than $100 billion for the first decade and by more than $1 trillion in the second decade.

As we have seen through the second enrollment period, the Affordable Care Act has already succeeded in ensuring every American can have access to high quality affordable coverage.

Thanks to the ACA nearly, 30 million Americans got covered. These are people who would otherwise be uninsured. We have made great progress, but the work is not done. I thank the agency for implementing the landmark health reform law and continuing to work with us so that they can build on these successes.

It's -- in addition to prioritizing essential services and programs, I was pleased to see that the budget makes strategic investments to improve our health care system and clear the way for the progress into the future. This includes funding to support training of the next generation of health care providers, national preparedness against threats to public health, biomedical research, drug safety and mental health services.

The budget invests in community health centers to support the care that provide for 22 million patients in their role at providing an accessible, reliable source of primary care in underserved communities. Health centers will continue to be a critical element in our health system. The president's proposal takes a critical important step by including four years of funding for the children's healthcare insurance program.

Currently, more than 10 million children get health care insurance through CHIP. Additional funding for CHIP must be authorized so that there is no disruption in coverage and the states are able to continue operating their programs.

The budget proposes the increase in NIH funding, since its creation NIH is fostered new remarkable advancements in human health, but for the past decade, NIH has suffered inadequate funding. Without significant funding increases, the U.S. will lose its status as a global real leader in science and innovation. Additional resources will help defeat our nation's most harmful diseases and ensure that the United States continues to lead biomedical research and scientific breakthroughs.

The budget proposal strengthens national preparedness for threats to public health including naturally occurring threats and deliberate attacks. It also includes funding to reinforce our nation's ability to move quickly to detect infectious disease outbreaks through a new Advanced Molecular Detection initiative, maintaining strong expertise at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

These are just a few highlights of what is included in the proposed HHS budget. I look forward to hearing more about the administration's proposal during today's hearing.

Thank you, Madam Secretary for your -- joining the committee to discuss the HHS budget. And if someone would like about a minute and 20 seconds -- my colleague from California, Ms. Matsui.

MATSUI: Thank you very much for yielding me time. I welcome Secretary Burwell. I appreciate the goals the president and you have laid forth in the fiscal budget 2016, Department of HHS services budget.

Building on the improvements made by the Affordable Care Act we're seeking to move our nation's health system by rewarding volume and forgetting about the waste business. So -- what we try to do this is working to achieve the triple aim in health care -- better care, better outcomes, and reduced cost.

We do this by making health insurance more affordable, by emphasizing prevention and public health, by encouraging scientific and clinical research, by taking advantage of the benefits of technology and building up our nation's mental health system.

Many of the proposals in the budget find savings in the Medicare Medicaid programs, by streamlining processes and realigning systems to ensure that patients get the right service at the right time.

The budget will make the SGR fix permanent, which we need to do to provide stability for doctors and for seniors and people with disabilities in the Medicare program. The budget will also extend its Children's Health Insurance Program or CHIP, that provides much needed pediatric coverage to our nation's children.

To conclude, I want to emphasize the Affordable Care Act is working. Over 11 million Americans signed up this year, including 500,000 in California alone. The Administration just announced that since law was enacted in 2010, 9.4 million with Medicare have saved over $15 billion in prescription drugs. This is what we set out to do and appreciate working with you as we move forward.

Thank you. I yield back.

PITTS: The Gentlelady yields back.

The Chair now recognizes the chairman of the full committee, Mr. Upton for five minutes for opening statement.

UPTON: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Secretary Burwell, welcome.

Today marks your first official appearance before the Health Subcommittee, but I know that this is not your first time in this room, as you participated in one of our 21st Century Cures roundtables last year. And we very much appreciate that participation.

Your testimony does come at a very pivotal point in health policy, from our exciting cures effort to next week's Supreme Court oral arguments. We look forward to hearing the administration's perspective on the many important issues facing the American people.

You have said during your tenure at HHS that transparency, ownership, and accountability are important values for the department to demonstrate, which we certainly welcome. In that spirit, we look forward to gaining straightforward answers here today about implementation of the president's health care law.

There have been quite a few red flags raised in recent weeks on the continued struggles to implement key pieces of the health law. Just in the last week, 800,000 Households learned that key tax forms sent out by the administration contained major errors. Those Americans were asked to delay tax filing, therefore also delaying their refunds. A recent analysis from H&R Block estimates that the majority of Obamacare customers are being forced to pay back some of those subsidies.

Millions of Americans are also now learning about the law's IRS fines for failing to comply with the individual mandate. The backlash has been so intense that the administration has resorted to yet another special enrollment period to quell some of the anger of those who are just coming to learn about the individual mandate penalty.

And just last week, the healthcare,gov CEO Kevin Counihan suggested that the back-end functions of the exchanges would undergo a two-year development plan. That means this key part of the law will not be fully complete until President Obama leaves the White House.

Collectively, these revelations suggest that the health care law is still not working. Our constituents deserve better. We know that. That is why I have worked on introducing the Patient CARE Act, a health care reform blueprint with my colleagues in the Senate, Chairman Hatch, and Mr. Burr. I look forward to working with my colleagues about these ideas to improve health care in America by empowering states and families, not Washington.

Yes we have concerns with the president's signature law. But there are other important health areas that we believe are fertile for collaboration. For the past year, almost a year and a half, this committee has undertaken the bipartisan 21st Century Cures initiative to accelerate the pace of the discovery, development, and delivery of new treatments and cures for American patients.

I would like to thank you for your personal engagement on the 21st Century Cures initiative. As you know, this is a top priority for our committee this year. Patients and families in my district in Michigan and as well as across the country are looking for hope, and that's what we seek to instill.

And this effort is also important to many job creators as well, whether itbe Stryker, Perrigo or Pfizer in southwest Michigan. I also want to thank the staff throughout the administration, particularly at the FDA and the NIH, for their work, their time, and effort to help us improve the ideas released by our committee at the end of last month. We've established a very good foundation, I think, for bipartisan success. And I will yield to other Republican members on this side. Seeing none.

PITTS: (inaudible) none.

UPTON: I yield back.

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman. I now recognize the ranking member of the full committee, Mr.Pallone for five minutes for opening statement.

PALLONE: Thank you, Chairman Pitts and welcome Secretary Burwell. Thank you for being with us today.

Today, we're going to hear about the president's fiscal year 2016 health and human services budget proposal. And there are many important provisions in the president's budget that we in Congress must work to support.

I was pleased to see that the budget proposed a funding increase of $1 billion for the NIH investing in early stage basic research is one of the most promising ways that we can accelerate the discovery of new treatments and cures.

And support for NIH is critical to building our economy as well. Every dollar of NIH funding generates over $2 in local economic growth. Yet, we have let NIH purchasing power decline by over 20 percent since 2003, and that's why finding a way to significantly increase funding for NIH will be my top priority as the 21st Century Cures initiative continues. I was also pleased to see that the budget fully funds a four-year extension of the Children Health Insurance Program or CHIP. We must act on this proposal immediately with more than four-fifths of state legislatures adjourning by the end of June.

Lack of action and clarity from Congress will make budgeting and planning virtually impossible. By every measure, CHIP has become enormously successful and always has had strong bipartisan support. So extending CHIP funding should be the top priority of this committee to ensure consistent coverage for the millions of children who depend on this program. And I think we can all agree that no child should be left worse off because of the actions or lack thereof of Congress.

The budget also adopts the framework of the bipartisan bicameral SGR repeal and replacement legislation the Congress agreed to last year. I believe that because the sustainable growth rate is the result of a budget gimmick and we already spent $169 billion paying to fix the problem, that offsets especially those within our health programs are not necessary.

And if we must include offsets, the war savings which are known as the Overseas Contingency Operation Funds, could be used. I know some on the other side of the aisle don't share this view. What I do hope is that we can -- we can agree that first SGR should be paid off, should not be paid off on the backs of the beneficiaries.

Beneficiaries have already paid for their share of the cost of SGR repeal through higher premiums and half of all of the beneficiaries live on less than $23,500 per year. And that's why some of the proposals in the president's budget concern me.

The President's budget proposes to further increase Part B and Part D premiums, increase the Part B deductible for new enrollees and impose a new surcharge on the part B premium for beneficiaries with certain Medicare policies and also institutes a $100 copayment per home health episode.

And this increases out of pocket cost on beneficiaries and I think that, you know, we've had -- we've seen enough of that, beneficiaries may forego necessary services and as a result use more high cost acute care services, and such policies will disproportionately affect lower and middle income beneficiaries who are not poor enough for Medicaid nor have access to employer-sponsored retiree health care.

So I urge the president and my colleagues to be extremely cautious when proposing cuts to Medicare and consider the impacts on our seniors. The last thing I wanted to mention is, well, first to commend you, Secretary, for your agency's hard work implementing the Affordable Care Act. Because of your efforts, 19 million uninsured Americans will be covered in this year 2015. And I recognize the challenge your agency faces in implementing this law with limited resources. However, despite what I call Republican obstructionism, the Affordable Care Act is working.

In sum, I think this is a sound budget. And I look forward to hearing from you today. And I would yield the remainder of my time to the gentlewoman from Florida, Ms. Castor.

CASTOR: Well, I thank the ranking member for yielding time.

And I welcome Secretary Burwell. We're very excited to hear about the budget, the investments in medical research, in children's health insurance, improvements in Medicare and the Centers for Disease Control, but I couldn't help but ask Mr. Pallone for a minute to highlight the Florida enrollment numbers under the ACA.

It's remarkable. And I know you've seen them. And we've talked about it. As of February 15th, over 1.6 million Floridians have signed up for health insurance in the federally facilitated marketplace. We were surprised. This exceeded all of our expectations to beat California and Texas, especially in a state that had many fits and starts over, whether to assist our neighbors in signing up.

But I wanted to highlight a couple of stories, that a 24-year- old, third year law student at the University of South Florida got assistance from the navigator. His income is about $16,000 a year in scholarships. He was able to find insurance for approximately $10 per month, zero deductible. It's his second year enrolling in the marketplace. He's very happy with his coverage. There are stories like that again, and again, and again, so I look forward to talking about it. Thank you.

PITTS: The Gentlelady yields back. That concludes the oral opening statements. As usual, all the written opening statements of members will be made a part of the record. And so, we'll go now to Secretary Burwell.

First of all, thank you for appearing for us today, Madam Secretary. Your written testimony will be made a part of the record. You'll be given five minutes to summarize your testimony. And we certainly appreciate you being here this morning. And you're recognized for five minutes for your summary.

BURWELL: Thank you, Chairman Pitts, Chairman Upton, Ranking Member Pallone, and Ranking Member Green, and members of the committee. I appreciate the invitation to be here today.

I want to thank you for the opportunity to discuss the president's budget for the Department of Health and Human Services. I believe firmly that we all share common interests, and therefore we have a number of opportunities for common ground, from preventing and treating substance abuse to advancing the promise of precision medicine, to building an innovation economy and strengthening the American middle class.

The budget before you makes critical investments in health care, science, innovation and human services. It maintains our responsible stewardship of the taxpayers' dollars. It strengthens our work together with the Congress to prepare our nation for key challenges both at home and abroad.

For HHS, it proposes $83.8 billion in discretionary budget authority and this is a $4.8 billion increase, which will allow our Department to deliver impact today and lay a strong foundation for tomorrow.

It's fiscally responsible budget, which in tandem with accompanying legislative proposals would save taxpayers a net estimated $250 billion over the next decade. In addition, it is projected to continue slowing the growth of Medicare.

It could secure 200 -- $423 billion in savings as we build a smarter, healthier, better system. In terms of providing all Americans with the access to quality affordable health care, it builds upon our historic progress in reducing the number of uninsured and improving coverage for families who already have insurance.

We saw a recent example of this progress with the about 11.4 million Americans who either signed up or reenrolled in this past open enrollment. It extends CHIP for years. It covers newly eligible adults in the 28 states plus D.C. which have expanded Medicaid and then improves access to health for Native Americans.

To support communities throughout the country, including underserved communities, it invests $4.2 billion in health centers and $14.12 billion to bolster our nation's health workforce. It is -- it's more than 50,000 National Health Service core clinicians, serving nearly 16 million patients in high-need areas across the country.

With health center mandatory funding ending in 2016, we estimate that more than 7 million Americans may lose access to essential cost- effective primary care. And this could approximately result in 40,000 jobs lost.

To advance our common interest in building a better, smarter, healthier delivery system, the budget supports improvements to the way care is delivered, providers are paid and information is distributed.

On an issue for which there is bipartisan agreement, it replaces Medicare's broad sustainable growth rate formula and supports a long- term policy solution to fix the SGR. The Administration supports the type of bipartisan bicameral efforts that the Congress took last year.

To advance our shared vision for leading the world in science and innovation, it increases funding for the NIH by $1 billion to advance biomedical and behavioral research. In addition, it invests 215 million for the precision medicine initiative, an effort to focus on developing treatments, diagnostics and prevention strategies tailored to individual genetic characteristics.

To further our common interest in providing Americans with the building blocks for success at every stage of life, this budget outlines an ambitious plan to make affordable quality childcare available to every working class, middle class family.

To keep Americans healthy, the budget strengthens our public health infrastructure with $975 million for domestic, an international preparedness including critical funds to the global health security agenda. The budget will support CDCs critical infrastructure and crosscutting research to facilitate rapid response to public health emergencies and public health threats like the recent measles outbreak.

It also invests in behavioral health sciences and substance use prevention. Finally, as we look to leave our Department stronger, the budget invest in our shared priorities of cracking down on waste, fraud, and abuse initiatives and are projected to yield $22 billion in gross savings for Medicare. We're also addressing our Medicare appeals backlog with a variety of approaches and we're investing in cyber security.

As I close, I want to make one final point and that is I am personally committed to responding quickly and thoughtful to the concerns of Congress and members. Since I was confirmed, I've made a top priority of our Department to respond promptly and thoroughly and work with you as we can. I also just want to take one moment to thank the HHS employees for all their work on Ebola, unaccompanied children and all the other issues.

With that, I look forward to your questions. Thank you.

PITTS: Thank you, Madam Secretary.

I will begin the question -- and questioning and recognize myself five minutes for that purpose. Let me start with the King v. Burwell, in a few short days, the Supreme Court will be hearing oral arguments in the King v. Burwell case that could have a major impact on Obamacare.

In January, we sent you a letter asking for any actions, analysis or -- and/or contingency plans that HHS has undertaken to prepare if the IRS rule is overturned. And while we received a letter from you earlier this week, your response failed to actually answer our question. The letter simply stated that you believe no administrative action by HHS could reverse the effects of a decision in favor of the plaintiffs.

Madam Secretary, your statement of opinion in the letter does not answer our simple question, so let me ask you the question this way. Have you or senior department officials instructed counselors within HHS to prepare any potential actions or approaches if the Supreme Court rules against the IRS?

BURWELL: Mr. Pitts and Mr. Chairman, with regards to what is in the letter, one of the things that I think is important to reflect that is in the letter is the analysis of what would happen. That is a part of the letter.

And in terms of what would happen, and I first should state, we believe that the court will decide in favor of the position we hold, which is we believe that this law says that people who have traveled across the country, people in Texas should have the same subsidies as people in New York, so important starting point.

But with regard with what would happen, because I think that's an important part of answering the question, first, what would happen is when those subsidies go away, 11.4 million people, that was the number I gave you. As of January 30th, when we did our most recent analysis, 87 percent of the individuals in the marketplace are eligible for subsidies. Those subsidies are on average estimated to be $268 per individual per month. Those subsidies, number one, would go away.

PITTS: Yeah.

BURWELL: That would lead to a number ...

PITTS: Madam Secretary, I understand that. I'm asking if you know of any plan to respond to approaches if the Supreme Court rules against the IRS, has the White House, has the OMB or other administration officials directed or asked you about any approaches in response to King v. Burwell or the work with the Treasury Department on potential responses? That's my question.

BURWELL: So in order to respond to the question, Mr. Chairman, in order to think about the question of a plan, one needs to, I think analyze the problem, which is what I was articulating in terms of the three major things that would occur if the court decides with the plaintiffs.

PITTS: Let me ask it at a different way. I would like to provide you some more information, that's why we expect you answer from you today. The committee received recently specific information from a source within your department about the existence of an approximately 100 page document related to potential actions HHS may take if the Supreme Court rules against the administration in King vs. Burwell, are you or senior staff at HHS or whatever this document?

BURWELL: Mr. Chairman, this is not a document I am not aware of. With regard to the question that you have asked, as I've said in the letter, we believe and I think it's very important to understand the damage because it is related to the answer. The damage comes in the number of uninsured that would occur. Number two, it occurs, and what happens in the individual market place where a group of less healthy individuals come in and that drives premiums up in that market place. And number three, the indigent care that occurs from the uninsured and what that means in both those states in terms of their economies as well as what it means for employer base. Those are the ramifications.

With regard to those things which we believe are the damage, as I state in the letter, we believe we do not have any administrative actions and therefore, there is not...

PITTS: All right, let me ask - going to another issue, I as you know as we discussed over the phone, I'm deeply concerned about the lack of HHS action regarding California and the DMHC authority to immediately include coverage for abortion. And this mandate, California mandate is a clear violation of the Weldon amendment which provides civil rights protections and prohibits funding to government entities discriminating against healthcare entities for following their conscience. Do you agree that the Burwell plan prohibits funding for states that mandate abortion coverage in insurance plans?

BURWELL: We take the Burwell amendment very seriously and since you spoke with me, Mr. Chairman, and we received those letters, we have opened an investigation in the office of civil rights at HHS to investigate the concerns that you and others have articulated. We take this seriously and are trying to move through that investigation is expeditiously as possible (inaudible).

PITTS: Since it's clear that California is in violation of federal law, can you project a date by which you expect the violation to be stopped?

BURWELL: With regard to the issue of the investigation, Mr. Chairman that's not something I need to let the investigation go and I have asked the team to make sure they do it as expeditiously as possible. But in order that I stay away from the investigation in terms of my interference in any way I want to let them go forward, but I have asked for due speed.

PITTS: OK. We'll follow up. Thank you. The chair recognize the Ranking Member Green for his questions.

GREEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Madam Secretary, it's been almost five years since the Affordable Care Act was passed and I have yet to see any legislation introduced by my Republican colleagues to replace the Affordable Care Act even though we've had at least 56 votes on the House floor to repeal it. Given all these talk of repealing the Affordable Care Act, are you aware of any requests for technical assistance from Republicans on legislation that would replace the Affordable Care Act with a credible proposal to provide comprehensive health coverage to millions of Americans?

BURWELL: I am not aware of those requests.

GREEN: Madam Secretary, over the last couple of days we've heard a lot about contingency plans, if the millions of American's who received financial help through the Affordable Care Act would lose them. Are you aware of any Republican legislative proposals that would provide millions of Americans with the financial assistance that help them with affordable health care coverage?

BURWELL: I am not aware.

GREEN: Secretary, I want to get your input on an issue that I know your concern and I appreciate you're addressing in your opening remarks that myself and a lot of members of our committee, there's a funding cliff that's facing our community health centers. Health centers serve nearly 22 million patients and are projected to serve 28.6 million patients over - in over 9,000 locations across the country in the Fiscal Year of 2016. Because of the patient demographics and statutory mandate to locate in underserved areas or to serve underserved populations, health centers are well positioned to provide health care service to millions of newly insured Americans.

They are particularly important in our district. It's federally designated underserved community in Houston, Texas. Secretary Burwell, I was pleased to see the present budget included multi-year extension of mandatory funding for health centers. As you know the health centers' patients face a major loss of access in the few months. If we don't act or to prevent the funding cliff caused by the exploration of the mandatory funding at the end of the fiscal year. Can you speak about the importance of community health centers within our health system as we look at the issues of access, quality and cost?

BURWELL: We believe that they are our fundamental underpinning and not just in terms of health care in communities, but they are also an important part of the economics of communities when you think about the fact that we could lose up to 40,000 estimated jobs in terms of - if we don't extend. But as you think about the numbers thinking that one in 15 Americans actually are served by these health centers. How integral they are to providing primary care throughout the country.

And so, I think it's extremely important to continue that so that we can as we've reduced the number of uninsured, we also want to make sure that those people are having care and those that had care before still have access to that care, especially in our underserved communities across the country, not all, but many of which are very rural.

GREEN: Can you comment on the impact of the funding cuts would have on patients' access to care? Can you estimate how many fewer people would be able to receive services at our local health centers?

BURWELL: Are estimates are that if we aren't able to extend that it could be up to seven million patients who would no longer be able to have access to that care. We estimate that perhaps over 2,000 of the centers would shut down without that and that, then there are the patients who would not be served because people would have to scale back in the number of the centers with reduce funding.

GREEN: In those 2,000 centers do you know how many jobs we'd lost?

BURWELL: Approximately, the estimates are up to 40,000.

GREEN: OK. Thank you. The health centers are a crucial part of our nation's primary care infrastructure for 50 years and have long had a truly bipartisan support. And last year along with my colleagues on both sides including Representative Lance, support for reiterating our support for health centers in calling for a bipartisan solution, we had 250 co-signers including 31 members of our committee. A similar letter in the Senate gathered 66 votes and more than hundred national organizations have called for a fix. Consensus is something that must be done and we have to act as soon as possible.

This issue is a top priority of mine and I know a lot of other members literally Republican and Democrat across the country to look forward to working with you and our colleagues on the committee on a bipartisan basis to find the solution to avert that funding cliff.

Mr. Chairman, I have 43 seconds left and I'd like to yield for somebody for that 43 seconds on our side. Anybody want about 30 seconds now? OK. Well, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

PITTS: Thank you. The chair now recognizes the chairman of the full committee Mr. Upton, five minutes for questions.

UPTON: Thank you again, Mr. Chairman. Secretary Burwell, there are a number of healthcare law implementation issues that continue to trouble us, in the interest of time I'd ask that you submit answers to the following questions in writing within two weeks.

The CEO of healthcare.gov recently stated that there is a two- year development plan for the backend of the healthcare.gov. If you could provide us an estimate of when the backend will finally be fully automated will be great. Second one is HSS recently announced that 800,000 Americans enrolled in coverage through healthcare.gov received inaccurate tax forms under the ACA.

We'd like a detailed assessment on what - on when the department expects these taxpayers will have accurate information in hand so that they can file their taxes. And third, many Americans were automatically re-enrolled in exchange plans, raising concerns that individuals and families may be getting unexpected premium bills or inaccurate exchange subsidies in 2015. We would ask that you submit specific data on the number of Americans who have been automatically re-enrolled in those exchange plans, that'd be helpful.

BURWELL: I'd be happy to.

UPTON: Now, I'll return to 21st Century Cure and again, I appreciate your personal assistance with this and I - for the record, I want to certainly thank Dr. Collins (ph), Commissioner Hamburg (ph), Dr. Woodcock (ph) and Dr. Shuren (ph), countless others at your department for the help on 21st Century Cure. Because of that participation and participation of folks from across the country we've been able to learn more about the status of innovation in this country and we hear about ways to accelerate the discovery, development, and delivery of cures and treatments for patients.

As we heard at our first round table, there are over 10,000 diseases and we have only cures and treatments for about 500. So, we have a great deal of work ahead to do. We released a discussion document last month and I've been working with the Congresswoman to get, Mr. Ranking Member Pallone, Mr. Green, other members of our committee on both sides of the aisle to improve that document.

One area that includes a placeholder is precision medicine, something that the president talked about in the state of the union address and subsequently a White House event a couple of weeks ago. We put that place - we did put that placeholder into the draft and we look forward to continuing to work with you and the White House, the administration on that important issue. Could you give us some background on the administration precision medicine policy and what we should look forward to?

BURWELL: Thank you and thank you for the partnership as we work through these issues and it's exciting to have the energy around these issues including the precision medicine, which I think a subset of the broader issues you're looking at.

Our precision medicine initiative is $215 million with regard to as we think about it from a budget perspective, but I think thinking about it from the pieces and what it's doing, one part of the initiative is creating a very large database of a million people through NIH, but we will access that through other channels so that we're drawing from existing databases to get the information we need. Because as we're talking about what this is, precision medicine or personalized medicine is getting the information so that we can do treatments that are to the individual. I was at NIH recently. I had the opportunity to both see the tumors and meet the cancer patient of a kidney cancer patient where he had had a group of tumors removed, they came back.

But then, using precision medicine, which meant looking specifically at the genetic makeup of his tumors that could be treated in a different way, I met him. That happened months ago and now he - the patient was there discussing with me and is in a very different place.

So, one, that large database, two, specifically focusing in the area of cancer because we already are seeing some progress there and we believe that place is ripe for it. The other thing we need to do is FDA to make sure that as we think about precision medicine we regulate and think about how to approve these things in ways of a different type of medicine. And then, finally, we need the health records, the office of national coordinator for health - electronic health records to be a part of making sure this will do with payments and how clinicians will use. Those are the elements.

UPTON: But I just want to say that's very helpful and we're excited as well. And though I've been out to the NIH a number of times in the past number of years I want to remind members here that we've got a committee trip, we've invited I think all the members on this sub-committee to go out to the NIH next Monday morning.

Dr. Collins has been very interested in having us out to kick the tires like you saw yourself and I know that because we have votes tomorrow Friday and again on Monday and perhaps over the weekend, there may be more of us here over the weekend than originally thought. So, I want to remind members that they're invited to join with us and not miss votes Monday on a trip there and I yield back. Thank you very much.

PITTS: Sure. Thanks, Gentleman. I recognize the Ranking Member of the full committee, Mr. Pallone. Five minutes for your question, sir.

PALLONE: Secretary Burwell, you know, I'm sure you can sense that I'm very proud of the Affordable Care Act and concerned about Republican efforts to repeal it or now take it to court in the case of King versus Burwell. Are you aware of any Republican bill that would reduce the number of uninsured in this country by 11 million people or I said 11, it's actually 19 million people, the way that the Affordable Care Act does? I mean, obviously, I'm saying this because I don't see them coming up with any alternative.

BURWELL: You know, we haven't and I think it's important to reflect historically, when one looks at the history and actually I've gone back to Teddy Roosevelt and the quotations from Teddy Roosevelt forward to both Republican and Democratic administrations. We see whether it was President Bush, President Nixon, you know, Republican and Democrat, plus President Clinton. The conversation about how we make this next step forward with regard to reducing uninsured is something that we struggled with as a nation.

And this is the first time and someone reflected on the anniversary of Medicare and Medicaid - Medicare, in that 50 year anniversary, this is the first time that we have seen that. And so the plan that we have in place, the implementation of the Affordable Care Act has done that, but we have not seen any alternatives.

PALLONE: All right, let me ask you about CHIP all the Democrats on the committee recently introduced the bill to extend the CHIP program and I want to emphasize again that we have to act on this legislation immediately when we considered SGR which expires at the end of March. Well, funding may not expire until the end of September for CHIP. In fact, 20 states will finish their legislative sessions by the end of April and more than half by June 1st.

So it's clear that Congress needs to act swiftly to ensure states can budget appropriately for CHIP and to avoid any disruptions in children's coverage. So given the bipartisan history of this program I see no reason why Congress can't act very soon. Can you comment on the impact on states if the CHIP funding isn't extended soon?

BURWELL: I would comment on that from two different perspectives, one as a former director of OMB and the issues of predictability of funding and the issues of management and ability to manage. And so for the states to be able to do that, this is something that's important when we had predictability in our own budget system. We've seen the benefits of that economically throughout the past years, two years.

And the other thing I would say is having just spent a lot of time with the governors this weekend when they were in town. This is a very important issue to them. We have seen that letter that 40 governors have signed with regard to knowing that they have that predictability of a program that is providing great benefits to the children in their states.

PALLONE: Now, the Senate and House Republicans have released the CHIP proposal this week. However, this proposal would institute a 12- month waiting period, needlessly forces low income children off of Medicaid and on to CHIP and reduces or completely discontinues coverage for children above 250 percent of the federal poverty level despite the choice of 28 states around our nation to cover those kids. Can you discuss the impact of policies like this on some of our most vulnerable children?

BURWELL: So I think, we think that the CHIP program ss a program that was a bipartisan program and a program that is working in delivering results in terms of that quality healthcare for those children. And it has worked, we believe that it's in our budget, a four-year extension of the program is a very important thing and that we need to do that in the timely fashion to both make sure those children are covered and receive the care that they need. But also in addition to that have predictability for states, especially those states that are in their legislative process right now.

PALLONE: And I know you mentioned that four year extension, the budget includes a four year extension of the CHIP program. Can you talk about why that full extension of four years is so critical for the kids that depend on this health coverage and maybe also mention as part of the extension, the budget includes a permanent extension of express lane eligibility, if you'd talk about the success of express lane eligibility as an option for states.

BURWELL: So the express lane eligibility and those issues, we - folks ask us to try and figure out ways to simplify, to make things easier and that's making things easier in two ways, when hear from folks, it's about both the customer in terms of when they came in as well as the states. And we believe this is a program that's been successful in getting to that simplicity and the simplicity often can work to create either, a, better quality or, b, lower cost and so, we think that's important. With regard to the four years we believe that is a good amount of time and the right amount of time for us to do this extension. There will be interaction with the Affordable Care Act, we know that and we believe that the four year period is the right period for us to understand and look at that.

PALLONE: Thank you. Mr. Chairman, I'd like to submit for the record two CHIP articles, the first is an op ed published in the New York Times this month by Former Secretary Hilary Clinton and Former Senator Bill Frist (ph) discussing the long term bipartisan history of the program and the importance of a four year extension. And the second article was published in New York Times last month shows how health coverage for children pays for itself and all the research showing that when children have health coverage future earnings are boosted, if I could...

PITTS: Without objection ordered.

PALLONE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

PITTS: The chairman yields - the Gentleman yields back - the chair recognizes the chair emeritus to the full committee, Mr. Barton for five minutes for questions.

BARTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being in here. As I have talked to you before there are a lots of problems that we have deal with, you in your position and the committee in our position. But there are some opportunities for bipartisanship and one of them is a piece of legislation that we call the ACE Kids Act. The original co-sponsors are Ms. Castor of Florida, Ms. (inaudible) of California, Mr. Green of Texas, myself on the Republican side along with several other members of this committee on the majority side.

You've said in your opening statement that the Medicaid is going to be about $345 billion this year, an increase of I believe of over 16 billion. Well, there is one piece of legislation we could pass on a bipartisan basis that would actually save money in Medicaid and that's the ACE Kids Act. It creates a home for families that have medically complex children based on an anchor hospital concept with the major children's hospitals in America, I think there are about 60 of them.

So if a parent has a child that's medically complex and qualifies for the program, that child gets access to the network on kind of a one-stop shop, all the specialties, all the various procedures are provided. Medicaid is billed one time. We think there are 12 million children that would qualify for the program and we believe that it will save billions of dollars over a ten year period.

It's been introduced in the Senate. The identical bill with three Republican co-sponsors, three Democrat co-sponsors, so here's a rare piece of legislation that both sides that I will support, the Republican leadership supports it, Chairman Upton supports it, Chairman Pitts supports it. Does your department have a position on the bill and if so could you explain to the committee what that position is?

BURWELL: So with regard to the specific legislation, I don't think we as the administration have issued a (inaudible) but I would say is all of the concepts we agree and we welcome the opportunity. The idea that we can improve both quality and cost for these children who are very complex and who are moving state to state and the current system doesn't afford us the opportunity both with regard to making sure we don't have duplicative payments, we obviously do not want that from a fiscal responsibility. And we want that ease that the parent can have the child at the right place with the right care even if it's across state lines. So I would just say we look forward to working with you.

Welcome the opportunity if there are questions and ways that we can provide, technical assistance and other things as part of this, we welcome that opportunity because we agree with the fundamental of what we're trying to do here and believe this is something that can improve both cost and quality.

BARTON: Well, I would encourage you and your department to take a look at the bill. It's not illegal or immoral for the administration to issue a letter of support and this is one that I think with Chairman Upton and Chairman Pitts and the ranking member and the full committee and sub-committee and leadership on both sides of the aisle in the House, this bill could go.

It could be a part of Chairman Upton's 21st Century effort or it could be a standalone bill. I also in the brief time I have want to concur with Ranking Member Green said about community health centers. I hope we can work together in a bipartisan fashion to find an answer to keep those funded. I know there's a funding issue this year that we need to address and reauthorize the program. I have a number of those health centers in my Congressional district and they are very helpful providing indigent care.

And finally, I wasn't going to ask this question but I'm a little bit puzzled when Chairman Pitts asked you the question about this report that deals with planning in case the health exchanges at the state level under the Affordable Care Act are found to not be legal the way they're currently funded, if there was a plan and if you had seen the plan. I'd take you at your word that you haven't seen the plan, but you don't think it's prudent that there should be a plan? I mean I hope I don't have a primary opponent. I hope I don't have a general election opponent, but I have a plan in case I do. I know you hope that the court upholds your position, but shouldn't the - shouldn't the administration and your agency have a plan in case it fails?

BURWELL: Congressman, what we seek in the letter and what we believe is if the court decides, which we don't believe they will, but if the court decides on behalf of the plaintiff, if the Supreme Court of the United States says that the subsidies are not available to the people of Texas, we don't have an administrative action that we could take. So the question of having a plan, we don't have an administrative action that we believe can undo the damage. And that's why when I was answering the chairman, I think, it's important to understand what the damage is because then it comes to the question of we don't believe we have any administrative...

BARTON: So my time has expired, but if the court strikes it down, the administration is just going to hold up your hands and say we surrender?

BURWELL: What we believe is - we believe the laws as it stands is how it should be implemented.

BARTON: I understand.

BURWELL: And with regard to when the Supreme Court speaks, if the Supreme Court speaks to this issue, we do not believe that there is an administrative authority that we have in our power to undo it. And so that's something we don't believe we have.

BARTON: That's puzzling but I accept that. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your courtesy and the minority for letting me have the extra time.

PITTS: Sure. Thanks, Gentleman. And now I recognize the Gentleman from New York, Mr. Engel, five minutes for your questions.

ENGEL: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman and welcome Secretary Burwell. Let me piggyback on backup plan. You know, I was part of this committee, I participated in months in months of deliberations for the Affordable Healthcare Act. We had weeks of markups, this committee did, and not once was the mention of subsidies not being available to individuals in states that did not set up their own exchanges.

I've heard a lot of complaints on the other side of the aisle about the law but never was this issue discussed until they lost at the Supreme Court in 2012. Some of my friends signed on to amicus and wasted incredible time forcing votes on the full repeal of the law, yet they're upset that the administration doesn't have a back up plan should the Supreme Court ruling threaten the availability of subsidies for 8.6 million Americans, and I think it's somewhat ironic that my Republican friends are demanding that this administration fix problems that they themselves created and have shown zero interest in fixing.

Should the Republicans get what they want and the Supreme Court rules in favor of King, I would urge my colleagues if that should happen to pass legislation to ensure that Americans have continued access to affordable coverage through the federal facilitated exchange just as Democrats intended. Next month the Affordable Care Act will have been the law of the land for five years. It's not a perfect law and there are issues that need to be changed with it, but I would like to see those issues addressed, unless both of us in a bipartisan way turn our focus on improving the law and enabling more quality coverage options for our constituents instead of trying to kill it, repeal it, take it to court and things like that. So, I just wanted to say that I'm sure that you agree with what I just said.

BURWELL: Yes. We look forward to moving forward and we do want to make improvements as we can.

ENGEL: Thank you. And I want to use my home state of New York as a great example of what's possible when the federal government has a willing and enthusiastic partner in the affordable healthcare implementation. As a result of our successful exchange and Medicaid expansion more than 2.1 million New Yorkers have quality healthcare coverage. Our state's uninsured rate has dropped to only 10 percent and there is clear evidence we are reaching the right people too, since 88 percent of people who obtain coverage through the exchange reported being uninsured at the time they enrolled.

So, it's really working in New York. And the health insurance options available through New York State of health are on average 50 percent cheaper than the comparable coverage available before the exchange was established. So, I want you to know, I'm sure you know it, that the ACA is working and working well in New York and that's why I really think it's terrible that I've been forced to take more than 50 votes to repeal some or all of this law. We should fix what's wrong, but in my state, it's really been a tremendous success.

BURWELL: And fortunately, I've had the opportunity to travel the country and see the individuals, those are the numbers and the individuals and whether it's Laura in Florida, 26 years old, married to someone who's a truck driver who does not have coverage. She is training to be an X-ray tech. They have two children. They did not have insurance. She now has insurance with a premium of $41 a month. Or a woman who had a MS in the State of Texas and for 17 years she had not had health insurance. And so how people go about - she treated her MS through the emergency room and she has four children and she works. And so when it would get bad enough, that's what she would do. And so the stories of what it means to people in terms of their financial and health security I think are - the numbers are important but it is those stories which really make this real.

ENGEL: And, you know, Secretary Burwell, I understand that we have seen robust exchange enrollment nationwide even in states where Republican governors refused to set up a state exchange or expand their Medicaid programs, isn't this true?

BURWELL: So the numbers and I spoke to this yesterday when we've been able to look at the numbers, 53 percent of the enrollees in the marketplace this year, in the federal market place are new enrollments. And so I think that is indicating the demand for the product and the need for the product.

ENGEL: Thank you. I want to second Mr. Pallone's positive discussions about CHIP. I've always been a strong supporter and as of July, 2014 an estimated 476,000 children were enrolled in this affordable coverage option for their care in New York. And so, I think that that is really, really important. I was pleased therefore to see that the budget proposal for FY 2016 included funding - included funding for CHIP for the next four years to FY 2019. So can you elaborate on what you believe increasing tobacco taxes is a viable means for funding this program while we sort out the transition issues associated with the Affordable Care Act?

BURWELL: We believe - one of the things we're trying to be physically responsible and indicating how we are paying for things. We believe that this is a legitimate way to pay for things, especially in the context of we are providing health care and something that we'll hopefully crate a deterrent and help healthcare in terms of the issue of the tobacco tax. As one analyzes across the department and whether it's a CMS or CDC the impact that tobacco has on health in our nation and the cost of healthcare in our nation is one that we think is a fair place to go to pay for this care for the children.

ENGEL: I agree with you and finally, I want to talk about graduate medical education because I was concerned that the administration's proposal to cut indirect GME funding, one in six positions in America obtains training in my home state of New York and we have some of the finest academic and medical centers in the country. So it requires significant funding and time to develop the infrastructure and expertise necessary to ensure quality care is available. So how do we ensure stability for these academic and medical centers and the patients they serve if we put GME funding at risk?

BURWELL: We believe and hope that our proposal does not do that and meets the objectives of making sure we are training appropriate physicians for both primary care and specialties where we don't have as many as we should, at the same time making sure that we target it. There's $100 million for pediatric, and then a wider pool for competition. It's an issue that we want to meet the same objectives, at the same time we do it in a fiscally responsible way.

ENGEL: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

PITTS: Thank the Gentleman, I will recognize is the vice- chairman from the subcommittee, Mr. Guthrie for five minutes for questions.

GUTHRIE: Thank you, Madam Secretary for coming, and I really look forward on 21st Century Cures, and all the things that we can work on over the next few years as vice-chair.

But first I'd like to direct your attention to the Cost Share Reduction Program contained in the ACA, specifically Sections 1402 and 1412. Does any part of this budget request -- or does any part of this budget that we're talking about today request any new authority, including any transfer authority to pay insurers under the Cost Share Reduction Program?

BURWELL: With regard to the program, which is a program as you know is about making sure that the cost of healthcare to those individuals that are coming into the marketplace is something that they can afford. That's what's it's about. And we believe that we do have the authorities to do the cost sharing.

GUTHRIE: Is there any new authority requested in this budget?

BURWELL: No new language.

GUTHRIE: There's no new language? And so, we do know it's up and running. I think we spent $3 billion already on the Cost Share Reduction Program that has been to insurers from taxpayer funds.

The budget that's been submitted estimates $11.2 billion over 2015, 2016. And CBO says $175 billion over the next 10 years is what they've estimated. And could you cite where the appropriations authority is -- as I said you do believe you have the authority, can you cite where that is?

BURWELL: We do believe we do and I'm sure you know that right now that this is an issue that is under litigation, and a court case that has been brought. And so, with regard to that, that is an issue that I will let our colleagues at the Justice Department speak to because of the place it is in litigation.

GUTHRIE: I understand that but we're doing oversight here. I'm not an attorney. And so, you had -- when you were at OMB -- at OMB in 2014 there actually was a request in the 2014 budget for direct appropriation. And that didn't happen for whatever reason but we're spending money.

So whether we spend a penny or 100 -- this is a $175 billion over a 10-year program. I mean, we feel like we -- this is an oversight hearing, not a -- and so, we feel like it's our responsibility to make sure to our taxpayers that we have good answers is on where this is coming from. So we're just asking for where the appropriation comes from -- authority...

BURWELL: I understand and I appreciate -- and I appreciate the question and I'm sorry that it is in litigation. I wish we weren't in a place where we are in litigation but when something has entered into that place it does create a difficult circumstance. I respect the issue of oversight but because the litigation has been brought by the House on this issue we're in a place where I think that is the appropriate place for this conversation...

GUTHRIE: I'm just not aware of any pending litigation exception in oversight hearing questions. And is there like a legal case or authority, or did the Justice Department tell you, you don't have to...

BURWELL: With regard to issues that are being litigated, generally, those are matters that we refer and let the Justice Department continue on.

GUTHRIE: And I am sure that you're aware that we've never been able to get an answer from the administration from where the language -- nobody has been able to point to us where that appropriation language comes from. And it was -- and you previously had requested appropriation.

Let me ask you another question. Recently you received -- I think 18 employers groups sent you a letter urging that small groups be maintained at 50 employees. And they were citing an actuarial analysis that showed when they go to 50 to 51 they -- the acturial analysis said that it would estimate it that two-thirds of the members, that they would receive an increase of 18 percent. And I honestly don't believe that these small employers, 51 to 100 employees can accept an 18 percent increase in their premiums.

Also the promise that if you like the plan you can keep it, because if they have -- if the 51 to 100 have to go into the new plan they'll have to meet the requirements of the healthcare law that essential benefits and the other things that have caused other people to lose their -- the plans that they like if they could keep -- and due to this impact would you support allowing states to keep their market at 50 or below, and not go to the 51 to 100?

BURWELL: This is an issue that we are looking at and examining because we have a number of comments on it. And I would say is I would welcome -- I would welcome the opportunity to see the piece of work that you're talking about and referring to so that we can see and understand that. I think what we want to do is understand the facts around this type of thing. So I would welcome the opportunity to see this study and piece of work that you're articulating.

GUTHRIE: OK. My understanding it has been submitted, a letter from this 18 employers, but we'll make sure that that -- that is forwarded.

BURWELL: OK.

GUTHRIE: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I yield back.

PITTS: Sure. And I thank the Gentleman.

And I now recognize the Gentlelady from Illinois, Ms. Schakowsky for five minutes for questions.

SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here today. I wanted to ask you if you are aware of any Republican legislative proposals that would keep insurance companies from denying coverage from people with pre-existing conditions like cancer or dropping someone from coverage because they got in an accident or got sick.

BURWELL: I'm not aware of a piece of legislation that would take care of that issue.

SCHAKOWSKY: And are you aware of any Republican legislative proposal that would provide access to preventive services like cancer screenings, yearly wellness exams and do that at no additional out-of- pocket cost to consumers?

BURWELL: I am not aware of a piece of legislation that would do that in the fulsome way that the ACA does.

SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you. I wanted to talk a little bit about something that's a growing concern and that's Alzheimer's Disease, and the cost that it is in our personal lives and also in funding. So, scores of public agencies, including many HHS agencies, as well as numerous private and nonprofit organizations are trying to address this challenge of preventing Alzheimer's, serving those who have dementia today, finding a cure. Shouldn't the federal government be coordinating a plan on Alzheimer's?

BURWELL: In terms of the issue of coordination there is a body and advisory group that includes both people from the federal government, as well as external folks to be a part of putting together our thoughts and strategies. And this is -- it informs that we are doing investments. There are members of the federal government, across the government, as well as external bodies that are a part of that.

With regard to the work at the department, the work cuts across a number of different areas, NIH and research is generally what comes to mind from those people, but where the biggest dollars are spent is actually in CMS, and making sure that we're thinking through the issues and in that space because that's where the dollar is.

The other thing is the administration for community living is where we work on and think about things like those that are caregivers, and those that are going through that process of dementia and how they deal with it. So at the department we work through all of those. There are these overall advisory groups that we have externally and includes internal members.

SCHAKOWSKY: So, the population is aging rapidly obviously and Alzheimer's is taking a much bigger toll than ever on families, on healthcare systems, on people who have the disease. And the number of people living with dementia will continue to grow as Baby Boomers age. So you had mentioned that the research is going on, so what is HHS, NIH is doing to find a cure?

BURWELL: In this budget you see a 24 percent increase to funding for Alzheimer's which is much greater than the percentage increase even within the other NIH. So, focusing deeply on doing that is also part of the brain initiative as we think through their specific issues.

But we were also making progress on something called Teal (ph), which is a protein that is indicative of Alzheimer's. That's one of the pieces of research that's going on. And if we can make progress there -- the other piece of research is seeing if there are ways that we can slow the progression by understanding how the neural channels move and what's happening in the disease. Those are pieces of research that we're starting.

We believe that with the funding we're asking for, that we can move that research. We can broaden it and we can make it faster.

SCHAKOWSKY: So, dementia is a major focus of work in the United Kingdom and other developed countries. Are we keeping up with the rest of the world in research activities and investments?

BURWELL: You know, we believe that we are with regard to that. And I have been in touch with my colleagues and the secretary or the minister in the U.K. and continue to have those conversations.

So we make sure that we are learning and staying connected to our colleagues especially -- that's a particular example where I have been in touch Minister Hunt (ph) and we'll continue to do that so that we'll make sure that we're learning everything we can from our colleagues and in places where we can work together and see if we can leverage the efforts that are going in each of our countries. And that's both across the research, the regulation, as well as the more social issues.

SCHAKOWSKY: And who is on the Alzheimer's Advisory Committee? I'm asking that because shouldn't there be a person with Alzheimer's as part of the group?

BURWELL: I want to get back to you directly but it is my understanding that there is a person, that there is a slot, and that there -- either there is or will be a person that that does have -- but that is part of the committee. And I want to get back to you on that very specifically.

SCHAKOWSKY: Well, I thank you for the focus and as the co-chair of the senior task force of the Democratic Caucus I really want to work with you on that because this is a problem affecting so many families and individuals. I appreciate it.

And I yield back. Thank you.

PITTS: The chair would like to thank the Gentlelady.

And I recognize the Gentleman from Kentucky Mr. Whitfield, five minutes for questions.

WHITFIELD: Thank you.

Secretary Burwell, well, I also want to thank you for being with us today and I want to just follow up on my colleague Brett Guthrie's question.

We're concerned about this cost reduction program because -- Cost Sharing Program because it's a $170 some billion over a number of years. And we understand that that's one of the issues involved in the lawsuit. But all we're asking you is since you all are dispersing the money what is your opinion as to where the appropriation is designated that you're working from?

BURWELL: This is an issue -- and as I said I understand the question. We believe we have the authorities. With regards to the specifics of that, because we are in litigation...

WHITFIELD: But you can't tell us where the money is coming from?

BURWELL: With regard to having that conversation that is what...

WHITFIELD: Were you instructed by DOJ not to answer that question?

BURWELL: With regard to that specific issue that is at the root of the litigation.

WHITFIELD: Were you instructed by DOJ not to answer the question?

BURWELL: With regard to -- when (inaudible) litigation like this , this is our standard...

WHITFIELD: Well, you know, yesterday we had Jenny McCarthy (ph) here and we were talking about 111-D (ph), which is before the Supreme Court right now. And she gave us her theory of why she thought she was right.

We're not saying that we're right or you're right, we're simply asking what is your theory, where does the money come from in your view?

BURWELL: That is something, as I said -- why don't I work to get back to you on where we feel comfortable with where the litigation is and I'd like to come back on that.

WHITFIELD: Well, I must say I have been impressed with your facility to use numbers. You were -- you're really tuned in to the budget, responding to Mr. Pitts, responding to Mr. Green about the community health centers.

I was at a Rotary Club meeting recently and I was asked the question. They said, "Congressman, can you tell us what dollar amount has been incurred by the federal government as a result of state expansion of Medicaid programs pursuant to the Affordable Care Act because we picked up a larger percentage of the normal cost."

And I would ask you that question. I didn't know the answer. But could you tell me what is the total dollar amount incurred by the federal government by the expansion of the state Medicaid programs a result of the Affordable Care Act?

BURWELL: In terms of the federal dollars versus the state dollars?

WHITFIELD: Yes, just the additional dollar amount incurred by us.

BURWELL: Let me go back and look because the question of being able to de-segregate whether a person came in because of expansion, or we're under the old rules. I think I would want to make sure that we can understand...

WHITFIELD: But you don't have a -- you don't have a dollar amount for that?

BURWELL: I'm not -- I don't know. I will check with the department if we do. The one thing that I think...

WHITFIELD: We would think that you all would definitely know that because that -- you know, we can all talk about the advantages and disadvantages of this program, but there is a big additional cost to the federal government. And we're simply asking, I'm asking what is that total dollar amount incurred?

BURWELL: I think the question that I am not sure is how one breaks out the actual number from expansion because when people come through...

WHITFIELD: Well, let me ask you this question...

BURWELL: That's where...

WHITFIELD: And what year does -- the states were encouraged to expand Medicaid which is fine because the federal government is picking up more of that dollar amount. But at some point in the future the federal government is not going to be picking up those additional costs.

What year is that?

BURWELL: What year that is, is we never go below -- the federal government never goes below a 90 percent of the payment of the additional...

WHITFIELD: Until when?

BURWELL: And that is 2020...

WHITFIELD: 2020...

BURWELL: And so, 2016 is the year through which there is a 100...

WHITFIELD: OK.

BURWELL: And in your own state...

WHITFIELD: Well, do you have any projected cost over that period of time for the federal government.

BURWELL: No, you have those incorporated in our budget. But one of the things in terms of these cost issues that I think are important in the state of Kentucky...

WHITFIELD: OK. Well, that's OK. Listen, you can't answer the question but I appreciate it anyway.

And then let me ask you this. I noticed that you all made $2.5 billion in loans in the coops. And Kentucky has a good coop program as well.

We sent a letter last year and we were concerned about the solvency of some of these coops. And the federal government, as I said, its loan is $2.5 billion. We now see that in Iowa and in Nebraska those coops are in bankruptcy.

Have you all done any analysis to project -- are there other states that there is a chance that these coops are going to bankruptcy, or are you looking at that?

BURWELL: We are looking at the coops that -- the one thing that I think is very important to note is the cuts, the deep cuts in the funding for coops. When the program was originally designed and the passage of the Affordable Care Act occurred, the amount of money for the coops to do the loans -- and the loans that states like Iowa would have made a difference -- at the end because those monies were cut, they were cut as part of sequestration, they were cut in '12. They were cut in '11. They were cut in '13.

WHITFIELD: So are you saying that bankruptcy occurred because of sequestration?

BURWELL: What I am saying is that had we had more funding in order to provide the additional loans to the coops it could have made a difference. With regard to the fundamental of your question which is are we looking at the coops? And there are two things that we want to do, understand whether they are stable. And then the second is where we can provide technical assistance.

WHITFIELD: Well, those questions that you couldn't answer or were not familiar with , I do hope that you will get back with us with those answers soon...

BURWELL: I would be happy to...

WHITFIELD: Within seven days if possible. Thank you.

BURWELL: I will -- I want to make sure that we will get back as quickly as...

WHITFIELD: Because I got to -- have to be back at that Rotary Club next week.

BURWELL: As a neighboring state I appreciate that.

PITTS: The Gentleman yields back.

The chair recognizes the Gentlelady from Florida Ms. Castor for five minutes.

CASTOR: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, thank you again on behalf of the 1.6 million Floridians that were able to buy affordable health insurance in our exchange. I will give you due credit and to everyone at HHS. But I think the real credit goes to our terrific navigators that were on the ground, hospitals across the state of Florida, community health centers and family members that probably put in a good word for their sons and daughters, or aunts and uncles to sign up. You probably want to give them a pat on the back yourself this morning. I'd encourage you to do that.

BURWELL: I do. I want to express appreciation. I've seen the local stakeholders. I've met with them across this country and it was the communities coming together. It was individuals. It was people in the community health centers. As was mentioned it was the business people. It was everyone when I would visit, the hospitals would be there. Everyone would be around the table working on this issue together. And it was that kind of work, and then the individuals that I visited on the Second Sunday (ph) and in Texas.

Actually I was given the opportunity to speak at one of the churches and it was all about coming together to give this information to people so that they could make choices, and have that financial and health security.

CASTOR: So in Florida we have a very competitive marketplace as well. Consumers could choose from 14 different issuers in the marketplace this year. That was up from last year where we had 11.

And Florida consumers could choose from an average of 42 health plans in their county for 2015 coverage. So with 1.6 million now enrolled it really demonstrates the high stakes involved with the Supreme Court case that the court will hear next week. I cannot imagine that the Court would rule to take that away from over a million and a half Floridians and then millions more all across the country.

And just like Representative Engel said -- I was here during the hearings in advance of the Affordable Care Act adoption, during the mark-up, during the amendment process, during negotiations with the United States Senate, never in those discussions was there any dichotomy between a state exchange and a federal exchange, and the availability of tax credits.

Have you seen any evidence to the contrary in your review of the record and the case that's before the Supreme Court?

BURWELL: With regard I would let the Justice Department who has reviewed everything. But the thing that I agree with is that we don't think that that was -- we just don't believe that that's what the law says, or what was intended by the law either.

CASTOR: Yes. And I can say straightforwardly as a member of this committee what the legislative intent was, and it was for those tax credits to be available to every American, no matter if they're in the state marketplace or a federal marketplace.

But I would say if the Court rules otherwise they're going to create chaos and they're going to strike right at the heart of the economic security of so many of my neighbors in Florida and many Americans. So, I know that they will study the legislative intent and I hope they rule the right way and we don't have to address that chaotic situation.

But I think that with the Affordable Care Act the real untold story is what has happened to people who have insurance, because I can cheer on the million and a half Floridians that now have it, but most of my neighbors already have insurance, private insurance or Medicare.

And I know there's more good news that was announced for my neighbors that rely on Medicare. Just in Florida alone Floridians have saved almost a billion dollars since 2010 because of the ACA's doughnut hole discount. Three hundred, almost 350,000 beneficiaries saw savings in 2014 to the tune of about $300 million last year. The average discount per beneficiary was $884.

Then for private insurance how come we haven't been able to get the word out on how much better an insurance policy -- a consumer can't be kicked off if they get sick. In Florida alone over 200,000 young adults can stay on their parents' plan. Floridians have received millions of dollars in rebates because the law says you have new rights and protections and insurance companies cannot spend that money on profits. It has to go to -- it can't spend the profits on salaries and excessive profits, it has to go to healthcare. How come -- what else can the administration do to tell this good news story?

BURWELL: I think we can do a better job of making sure people do know. And then another area is the issue of preventative care and the importance of the fact that your childhood visits and those things will no longer require co-pays or cost sharing in terms of when you go in for that or measles. An important thing, I think, right now, and timely thing. And so, I think we need to do a better job of making sure people know about those improvements to quality.

CASTOR: Thank you. I yield back.

PITTS: The chair thanks the lady.

And I recognize the Gentleman from Illinois Mr. Shimkus for five minutes for questions.

SHIMKUS: Thank you.

Secretary Burwell, thank you. I talked to your staff prior and I appreciate your outreach trying to call. It was a crazy day and I talked to them before you came to the table. And I do have great respect for that. But I also want to make sure that, you know, this happy-clap talk about how great the healthcare is and the Affordable Care Act is moderated by real concerns out there.

Remember the bill that passed and signed to the law we had nothing to do with it on the House side. It was a Senate health bill that came over to us that we passed, right? So that's the healthcare law that we have today. And the language of law is pretty clear. And I'm concerned also that the Supreme Court will rule that the federal exchanges in states are not authorized to receive subsidies and we just need -- we need to be prepared for that here. And I would hope the administration would be too.

I promised two ladies from my Congressional district that I would mention their names. Angie Eskar (ph) from Teutopolis who is pro- life, of strong family and she cannot buy a policy that does not have abortion or abortion coverage. And for millions in America this is a really important issue. And she -- and this is an emotional -- just like on the other side you know how this debate is. And I -- and I think part of the agreement from some of my pro-life Democrats was to ensure that that option would be available and it's just not for her.

The other one is Debbie McKinney-Huff (ph) from a town called Highland (ph). She's a Democrat. Her premiums went up astronomically last year. This year they've gone up another $2,000 with a $10,000 deductible. And she can't afford it. So for all the happy dancers there are -- there are challenges out there that we don't do our constituents service if we don't understand that there are problems that have to be resolved.

There are some budget requests that I want to talk about. And so, I'm going to move forward but I would just put that in the record. I'm a big supporter of Medicare Advantage. You know, I was here when we passed it. Seniors didn't have any prescription drug coverage. It's been very successful. It's very popular. The budget request makes a reduction again in that where the enrollment is going up, favorable are high and 670,000 people weren't able to access Medicaid Advantage. And if you are from rural parts of this country that option is very limited, if not -- or it doesn't exist. So I would ask that we re-look at that so that seniors who want to have this option can choose that. And our concern is your budget hurts the ability for that to happen.

BURWELL: So with regard to the first issue in terms of your two constituents I want to make sure that we understand that. On the issue of abortion in that....

SHIMKUS: And then let's just -- let's just answer this question because I got two more on the budget that I'm trying to address...

BURWELL: That we just focus on the Medicare Advantage issue.

SHIMKUS: Thank you.

BURWELL: With regard to that we want to make sure -- the program during the period of changes that we have had we've seen a large increase in the number of people in Medicare Advantage claims. I want to understand your 670 because 99 percent of beneficiaries have access to MA plans. And there may be something. And so, I'd like to understand that 670 better.

The third thing is that we know that those number of plans quality that have gone from four stars -- you know, gone to the higher ratings we've gone for 67 percent in the two highest rating categories at 17 percent to 67 percent. So we're improving quality.

More people are coming in this system and there is premium control. So, I want to understand the 670.

We want to make sure and are listening. We author our plans as we hear concerns, that's why I want to understand that 670 because we believe that we can continue making these changes.

It comes back to some of the points raised with regard to deficits and making sure that we're being responsible.

SHIMKUS: OK.

BURWELL: MedPAC and the GAO recommended that there is up-coding and we need to work on it.

SHIMKUS: OK. Thank you.

Are you aware of any efforts by FDA to accelerate the next round of user fee negotiations? And our concerns is if they are and they're not doing due diligence about the fees and the return on investment we would hope that they would not accelerate it until due diligence is done.

And the last thing I wanted to address was the Biologics Price Competition and Innovation Act -- stakeholders have to be involved in that. And that's really part of this 21st Century Cures debate. Not just having bureaucrats or panels but bringing patient, bringing physicians and bring in the like -- and our concern is that's not happening on this -- on the Biologics Price Competition and Innovation Act and those -- and those concerns.

And so, if you take that suggestion and if you want to come back and follow up on a lot of these issues we'd be happy to talk with you.

Again, I do appreciate you reaching out personally and I look forward to working with you.

BURWELL: And I do appreciate this issue of stakeholder input. We think it's important to making sure that we get this right.

SHIMKUS: Thank you very much.

PITTS: The chair thanks the Gentleman.

The chair now recognizes the Gentlelady from California Ms. Matsui for five minutes for questions.

MITSUI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Secretary Burwell, thank you for being here. I want to talk about mental health. When we think about health we need to consider the whole person. Mental health has historically taken a backseat to physical health, but the head is connected to the body and one affects the other.

I have been working for years with my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, and both sides at the capital to make changes, to fix our broken mental health system. And as you know a demonstration project based on The Excellence in Mental Health Act that I co-authored with my colleague here Congressman Lance into law last year.

And I look forward to working with you as -- and the administration to make sure that this is implemented properly and in a way that states can demonstrate success.

I also look forward to working with you to make further changes and improve our mental health system. I was pleased to see that the budget will eliminate Medicare's 190 day mental health services -- more in line -- and to keep that more in line with the physical for which no limit exists.

Can you briefly talk about that policy and how it will benefit seniors and people with disabilities who need psychiatric services?

BURWELL: Our overall approach in the mental health space and it's one that we consider a priority is to try and get us in terms of both care and payment to parity with how we think about other health issues.

And there are steps that we are taking throughout the budget and whether it's implementation of the piece of legislation that you referred, and the issue that your colleague just raised about stakeholder engagement and making sure that we're getting that input as we implement it.

And so, we're implementing and thinking about the policies to promote behavioral and mental health through our payment system and making sure that there is parity. That seems to be something that's been important.

We're trying to focus on access because many people, the question of access to the right types of providers in terms of behavioral health, that's something you see in some of our analysis at that time. Budgeting work in terms of making sure that SAMHSA (ph) and others are ensuring that we have providers.

And then there's access, and that's an issue for all people of all ages but especially young people getting the access that they need.

And so, as we think about all of the pieces working together about the funding, about the access and then -- that there are providers that can provide.

MITSUI: I appreciate that. And as we move forward there is a continuum of mental health issues that we need to address. And it's a complicated issue and we certainly would like to work with you as we move forward on that.

And I would like to also talk about seniors because that's a special interest area (ph) of mine too. And as we consider changes to the Medicare program our first priority should always be senior, especially knowing spend about 14 percent of their Household income on healthcare costs compared to five percent of Households who do not have a Medicare beneficiary.

And we need to find ways to save money in the Medicare program and we have been, but not by cutting benefits but by realigning incentives to improve outcomes in patient care. If a senior gets the right care at the right time it's not only better for the senior but it also saves the system a lot of money.

And now I appreciate some of the provisions in the budget and I would like to discuss this further with you. The budget seeks to save money by restoring trial (ph) rebates for the dual eligible population in Medicare.

Secretary Burwell, can you please elaborate on that?

BURWELL: In terms of the dual eligible policy?

MITSUI: Yes. Right. The drug rebates and dual eligible population.

BURWELL: One of the things that -- the dual eligible population has two elements to it. It is both a very complicated populated because there are people who have a number of different conditions that are being treated in different ways. It's also a very expensive population.

And as we work to improve both the quality and affordability of the care that's what we're trying to do as we look at these proposals. And it's all a part of the broader issue of delivery system reform which you touched on a little bit. And we have set out clear goals.

For the first time ever we have said that in the area of Medicare, that by 2016 we have set a goal that 30 percent of all payments will be in different payment systems, where we are not paying for volume but paying for value. And as a part of -- we move forward to this changed system, we want to do that. That's about price but it's also about quality. And this is a proposal that we're trying to move forward on both.

MITSUI: And I know that this is going to be difficult because there are areas where you have to look at the budget. But as we look at this we also have to look at the seniors and that's really why when we look at this -- I know you seek to increase sort of the skin in the game for Medicare beneficiaries.

However I would argue that seniors already have a lot of skin in the game and Medicare and that additional cost sharing will not bring down costs in the program. And as you know as they have increased costs -- you look at -- most of them are supported by Social Security and then that -- what they do is shift over the cost to pay for their healthcare from Social Security. And so, I think it's something that we really have to look at more holistically.

So, thank you very much for everything that you're doing.

PITTS: And I thank the Gentlelady.

And now I recognize the Gentleman from Pennsylvania Dr. Murphy for five minutes for questions.

MURPHY: Welcome here, Madam Secretary. I appreciate you being here. I also want to associate myself with the comments of my friend Ms. Matsui of California about mental health, and I look forward to working with you on those things. In a related area we've had a number of hearings here regarding mental health and among them has been the Substance Abuse and the Mental Health Service Administration. We've asked them repeatedly for information over almost a year for getting some records.

Chairman Upton and I have asked for these things. We have not gotten those documents. And we're concerned about their delays. I wonder if you could help us get some assurance that we'll get those documents from SAMHSA (ph)?

BURWELL: As you and I had the opportunity to discuss this, this is something that we are working on. And I'm hopeful that very soon you'll have some of those documents and we'll continue to work with you on it.

MURPHY: Thank you. I appreciate your teamwork on this.

On another question when we passed the SGR patch, I think it was last year, there was also a demo project, which is what Ms. Matsui was also referring to, for certified community behavioral health clinics to improve access.

Now as part of this we also attach something for AOT, assisted outpatient treatment for counties and communities to also have access to some grants to facilitate that as long as they also were -- so those community behavioral health clinics would get those -- to also help for those who are cycling through with a history of violence, prison, homelessness, et cetera, those, that small one percent of one percent, or persistent chronically and mentally ill and going through this system.

One thing is I want to make sure and find out from you is the way this was designed is to make sure that only those counties that really have AOT would be eligible for those grant programs if they're going to attach those to those community health centers. Is that something that you are aware of, and could you work with us to make sure that those grant programs are available in that sense?

BURWELL: We do want to work with you on that and, yes, we are working on that and we would like to work with you to make sure that we do have the standards in place.

MURPHY: Thank you.

Another one has to do with a program that was discussed by SAMHSA (ph) which is called I-CARE (ph) which is to help with those going into emergency rooms to deal with those in crisis. One of the concerns I have and certainly we have seen headlines and tragic sad cases such as that with Virginia Senator Creigh Deeds and his son Gus. The problems that there are thousands of times that this occurs in this country every year where there's just simply aren't enough psychiatric hospital beds.

And so, people languish in emergency rooms, often in a five point tie-down and given chemical sedatives until a room opens up. It could be hours or days, or weeks in some cases. We wouldn't have this problem if we had more psych beds. And so, I'm hoping that since the demand for psychiatric beds exceeds the current supply of inpatient psychiatric beds, is that something else that you can work as in legislation to say we ought to have a place for those in crisis to get stabilized and not go to jail, not sit in a jail cell and languish there, or sit in an emergency room. But work with us on that -- would you be willing to work with some of that too?

BURWELL: Yes.

MURPHY: Thank you.

BURWELL: Looking forward to that.

MURPHY: And another issue then related to the Assisted Outpatient Grant Program is a standalone thing. I want to show you, I think I have a poster here of -- I just want to show you some of the outcome measures.

This comes out of a Duke University study. When you have assisted outpatient treatment -- so working with someone from the court or judge, working with the person saying you need to stay in treatment for a number of months, outpatient treatment, not inpatient, take your medication and see this person, or report back like with a mental health court or something, they saw an 87 percent reduction in incarcerations, and 83 percent reduction in arrest, 77 percent reduction psychiatric inpatient hospitalizations, and a 33 percent reduction in ER hospitalizations.

So I just want to show that too. And by the way costs are cut in half for these folks too. But it is one in that -- and working with the issues of CBO scoring et cetera, we're really going to have to, I think, team up together in this and say there ought to be some options for people to be in outpatient care. And this is psychiatry, psychology, peer support, social workers, people helping with job training, housing, all those things together. But there has to be this coordination program. Would you work with us on this too?

BURWELL: We will. And I think it's part of the broader issue of delivery system reform and how we deliver quality. You're focused in a very important in mental health. When we look at diabetes and the clinics that I've visited across the country, when we get these adherence numbers up and people participating and that usually has to do with coordinated care and the type of interaction and communication you were talking about, we get adherence, we get less of the disease or problem, and we get lower cost because that happen when we have the bad things that go wrong when people aren't adhering.

MURPHY: Yes. It's going to require that different view of things. And I think you may be familiar with the hearing that we had in the Oversight Committee two weeks ago where a GAO report said and identified -- I was amazed by this, a 112 federal agencies and programs scattered across eight departments that deal with mental illness. And they said the Inter-Agency Coordination Program supporting individuals with serious mental illness is lacking.

It was really -- to me it's really dizzying and a sad description of the process here. I hope you will also work with us and it's a work to coordinate these programs. And can I have that assurance from you as well?

BURWELL: We will and we do coordinate -- we coordinate them across the over-arching issue and then within their areas like veterans homelessness and the issues that related -- and so, I want to have the conversation about how we think about and where we can strengthen those things.

MURPHY: Thank you. Let's continue working on that.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield back.

PITTS: The chair thanks the Gentleman.

And I recognize the Gentleman from Oregon Mr. Schrader from Oregon for five minutes for questions.

SCHRADER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you for being here, Madam Secretary.

BURWELL: Thank you.

SCHRADER: Last year healthcare spending grew at this lowest rate on record since 1960. Healthcare pricing inflation is at its lowest rate in 50 years. And ACA has gotten a lot of attribution by CBO from making a big difference in that result.

Have you seen a Republican legislative language that would give us that same result?

BURWELL: We haven't seen a proposal that would continue us on our path with regard to some of the changes that we've put in place.

SCHRADER: Seniors have also benefitted dramatically from the ACA. Prescription drug costs are a big issue for them. Eight million, over eight million seniors have actually benefitted from and saved over $11 billion, as I understand it, on prescription drugs since the enactment of the ACA.

Is there a Republican proposal out there that does a similar thing?

BURWELL: We haven't seen a proposal about that would take care of this issue, the doughnut hole. And actually on Tuesday we actually were able to update our numbers in that space. And it is now $15 billion in terms of the savings, and on average in the country that's about $1,600 per senior.

SCHRADER: I find that ironic that my colleagues on the other side of the aisle keep asking for a contingency plan from the administration on this bogus lawsuit.

And yet, you know, as a firm believer in Article I Legislative Supremacy, with all due respect, Madam Secretary. I think it's our responsibility and the majority of the party controls both chambers, and -- where the heck is their contingency plan?

That's a rhetorical question, Madam Secretary. .

One of the things that's been really good, I think, in my state is the expansion of the Affordable Care Act into the Medicaid population into the private sector. We've had some unqualified success. Emergency room visits are down by 21 percent. We've actually gotten hospital admissions complications from diabetes alone down 9 percent not to mention other diseases. COPD, Chronic Obstructive Pulmonary Disease, hospital stays down almost 50 percent. Are you getting any of the same -- those same types of results from other states? What...

BURWELL: So, we are in - recently actually in the last two weeks out of the State of Kentucky we have seen a piece of analysis done by the University of Louisville and Deloitte and that piece of legislation -- that piece of analysis showed, they did it at the beginning of the expansion and then they did that analysis now.

And what the analysis showed is that the expansion will contribute to 40,000 jobs in the State of Kentucky and will contribute to their GDP by $30 billion and that's at the period up to 2021, so that is over a period of time. But we are starting to see both the economic and job impacts as well as some of the health impacts that you were describing.

SCHRADER: Well, contrary to popular demagoguery in right wing radio and TV, this is a marketplace system we set up federal government as the facilitator in that, the state hopefully those -- some of the state exchanges are also facilitator.

Like everyone I think here, we all believe in the power of marketplace competition. My own state for instance over the last year instead of seeing the double digit increases in insurance premiums on average, ours actually stayed level or decreased slightly. Now, that to me is a key indicator for the, you know, working or non-working the Affordable Care Act, our uninsured rate in Oregon went down 63 percent. I've had testimonials from hospitals and doctors about how people actually have health care access at this point in time. Could you talk about what you see nationally in increased competition?

BURWELL: So, with regard to the issue of increased competition, we saw 25 percent more issuers come into the marketplace this year and so more issuers means more plans and competition.

SCHRADER: It means they wouldn't be doing this if they weren't making some money at this and the program wasn't working, Madam Secretary.

BURWELL: And so -- and also with regards to the issue of competition, what we know is in many plans that are employer-based plans; people do not come in and shop. They just automatically reenroll. And as you know, we have that as part of the marketplace this year.

But we know that actually the majority of people came in and shopped and that I think is related to the competition and it's related to a consumer who wants to make the best choice, and that choice sometimes based on benefit, that choice sometimes based on cost and cost has a number of different elements whether that's premium or deductible.

SCHRADER: Great.

BURWELL: But we are seeing more players come in and we're also seeing the consumer behave in a way that's indicative that they want that competition in shopping.

UNKNOWN: I'd like to call out some kudos on the GME increase in the budget, the money you put in for Medicare appeals back home. We do a lot of work, of course with people having trouble navigating the system big time and the investment in primary care docs, I think that's important. A quick little comment on -- the only thing I'm a little concerned about is if we're going to bundle payments and increased competition why we are hammering on the Medicare Advantage plans a little bit?

BURWELL: As I mentioned to your colleague I think what we're trying to do is balance making sure that those plans are good and strong and we've seen that over the period of the changes we've done. We try and do the changes in a measured way that gets to things that actually have to do with what we believe is strong representation of the taxpayer in terms of places where we believe there are issues like upcoding that is occurring and that MedPAC (ph) has articulated those and others. We always want to listen in here and we want to watch carefully if we're seeing problems that occur with the changes but to date we haven't.

SCHRADER: Thank you. And I yield back.

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman. And I recognize the Gentleman from New Jersey Mr. Lance five minutes for questions.

LANCE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary regarding King versus Burwell, understand what you had said that there can be no administrative action should the plaintiff win the case. You've stated that explicitly and repeatedly and that is not my question. My question relates back to the Chairman who said in his opening line of questioning that we have a specific source within your department that there is a document related to what HHS might do should the Supreme Court rule against the administration.

I understand that your point of view is that there can be no administrative action. You have stated that explicitly. Are you aware of any such document and I'm not asking about your position on administrative action. I'm asking about a document in this regard.

BURWELL: Congressman, I would -- if there is this document and you know of it, I would -- I would certainly like to know of the document because I don't have knowledge of a 100-page document.

LANCE: I didn't say 100-page now did I? I said a document. I don't know how many pages it is. You're not aware of any document?

BURWELL: What I have -- as I've said there isn't administrative action (inaudible).

LANCE: Yes, I don't -- I made that clear that I understand your point of view on that. Is there a document as to a reaction from HHS should the case be won by the plaintiff in the Supreme Court?

BURWELL: With regard to a reaction as I've said because I've articulated that I want to be careful because I have articulated (inaudible)...

LANCE: As I have tried to be careful.

BURWELL: ... the problems with regard to the question of what will happen. We know how many people are in the marketplace, how many (inaudible).

LANCE: Yes, that's filibustering. I understand that. I'm asking whether there is any document. We have a source indicating there is a document as to what might be the response from HHS.

BURWELL: I'm not familiar with the document you're referring to.

LANCE: And let me say that a former CMS administrator Tom Scully of, I believe, the Bush administration has said that, "Of course they have a document." He said, of course, they have one. I think he referred to a document. "They should all resign if they don't." I would hope that your department, Madam Secretary, would have some sort of contingency plan should the court rule for plaintiff. Do you believe that the suit is bogus?

BURWELL: With regard to the lawsuit as I've said what I believe is that the law is clear...

LANCE: Yes, I understand that. You believe the suit is bogus?

BURWELL: That's the characterization I -- my point about the suit is what I believe is that we hold the right position in the (inaudible).

LANCE: I understand that and it will be argued next week and a decision will be made by the end of June. Formerly, when I asked questions about this not from you but regarding prior officials, there was the impression that it was a frivolous suit. Do you believe the suit is frivolous or bogus?

BURWELL: What I believe is that we should continue making progress for the American people on three things that the Affordable Care Act (inaudible).

LANCE: Yes, I'm aware of that. Do you believe the suit is frivolous or bogus?

BURWELL: May I finish, Congressman? I believe that we as the executive branch and the legislative branch should be working together on three things we agree with. That's affordability, access and quality.

LANCE: I agree with all of that.

BURWELL: What I would like -- and what can -- would hope that we can do is build on the progress that we have seen. And that progress is that 11.4 million people...

LANCE: You're claiming my time. Do you believe that the Supreme Court is likely to rule unanimously on this decision?

BURWELL: As I've indicated we believe that the court will rule in our favor.

LANCE: Do you believe the suit is bogus or frivolous?

BURWELL: With regard to characterization, what I think is valuable is that we believe that our position is the position that will stand and that we believe we're right. The people in the State of New Jersey should not have their subsidies taken away be they do or don't have a marketplace when people right across the border in New York will get those subsidies.

LANCE: I believe, Madam Secretary, in equal justice under law as is inscribed across the street in the Supreme Court building, I believe this is a very serious case. I think it's closely contested. Under no circumstances do I believe that plaintiff will win nine to nothing.

I think there are good arguments on both sides. I have read the briefs, all of the briefs. I've read the Solicitor General's brief. I've read the brief of the plaintiff. I think it's a very serious case and you and I may disagree on the case. I respect that and I understand that.

It's frustrating to me that here in Washington, there cannot be an intellectual argument as to pros and cons and I certainly would encourage the administration to have a contingency plan and to work with us in Congress including the Republican majority in both the House and the Senate should the court rule for plaintiff.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

BURWELL: Congressman, with regard to the question of our authorities, what you just ended with was the issue of legislation and I want to make sure that I touch on that. As we have said all along we are willing and look forward to working with the Congress on any legislation that would work on those three things we talked about -- affordability, access and quality and preserves the economy as supports working middle class. That's how we look at legislation. We want to do that now and we want to do that (inaudible).

LANCE: And I was part of a group that had an alternative piece of legislation that didn't see the light of day put forth by the Tuesday lunch group of whom I'm a member of that group. It was different from the Affordable Care Act but it was an alternative piece of legislation and, of course, it didn't see the light of day in any way, shape or form in 2009 and 2010.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman.

I now recognize the Gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Kennedy five minutes for questions.

KENNEDY: Thank you. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, thank you very much for being here. You touched on a moment ago that legislation that you said you were eager to work with Democrats and Republicans, have you seen any such legislation?

BURWELL: With regard to legislation that would promote and move forward on those three things, the issues of the -- making sure we're expanding that insured population, I have not seen things that would work towards that.

KENNEDY: Madam Secretary, are you aware of how many bills were passed and signed -- bills that were passed by the 113th Congress?

BURWELL: I don't know the exact number.

KENNEDY: Give or take a few, 931, ballpark sounds about right.

UNKNOWN: That was one and a half (inaudible).

KENNEDY: Any idea on how many of those bills were signed into law, 296 sounds about right. Any idea how many times in my first term in Congress we repealed all or part of the Affordable Care Act, 55 sounds about right. Any idea how many times those were signed into law?

BURWELL: None.

KENNEDY: Any times -- are you aware of how many times we voted on some sort of replacement bill to the Affordable Care Act that we voted to repeal 55 times to provide Americans with quality, affordable access and financial assistance to access the health care that they deserve? None.

BURWELL: I think the number is none.

KENNEDY: OK. I would agree with you. So, I think given all of the discussions we've had over the course of the past several hours about contingencies, about other options and the time that I have been in Congress over 55 times in my first term including another time in my second term to repeal all or part of the Affordable Care Act and under the time that I've been here on a Republican leadership not a single bill have seen the House floor to vote on an alternative to provide quality, affordable accessible health care to millions of Americans, I would respectfully ask as my colleagues have for the administration to work with Democrats and republicans to work on any such legislation should they decide to bring that to the light of day.

BURWELL: And in our budget I would just like to mention we actually do have a proposal to improve the small business provisions of the Affordable Care Act to try and both simplify and make the tax credits better for small businesses. That's feedback we've received about that and that is something that is included in our budget.

KENNEDY: Now, turning to a couple of I think hopefully more substantive questions that I could get it with you, Madam Secretary. I was pleased to see that the Democratic (inaudible) Authorization bill that the president's budget was -- included in the president's budget extended the Medicaid primary care payment increase.

That rate of increase was -- that it was initially included in the ACA has been absolutely critical and for the last two years it's boosted payments to doctors who treat the most vulnerable populations making access an attainable goal no just an aspirational target.

According to our recent report from the Urban Institute, however, the expiration of that payment (inaudible) at the end of last year will result in Medicaid provider payments that are going to be cut on average of 43 percent and over 50 percent in some states. The impact on wait times could be drastic and immediate.

I was hoping, Madam Secretary, you might be able to comment on the importance of the parity between Medicare and Medicaid payment to our primary care providers and when they have to choose between seeing some of our most vulnerable populations like seniors, pregnant women and children, why would there possibly be a reimbursement discrepancy.

BURWELL: So, I think as your indicating why we have proposed the continuation of these payments is because we believe that it is making a difference and it's making a difference to the access and coverage that people are getting in the system.

And so, we proposed it as a continuation and we hope that that's something that the Congress will consider and support.

KENNEDY: Thank you. The second topic that I want to touch on today actually my colleague Mr. Murphy touched on it quite extensively in his comments but it's about substance abuse and mental health.

Back in Massachusetts, Madam Secretary, I see communities on the front lines of a growing and extraordinarily devastating opiate abuse crisis and we're looking to the federal government for some support as prescription drug abuse and a number of heroin overdoses continue to mount.

Madam Secretary, as a prosecutor before I ran for office, I saw the impacts of this on a daily basis not just in terms of addiction and people needing treatment but in terms of property crimes, personal crimes for folks that are looking to try to find a way to get help but the treatment options just aren't there.

There are not enough doctors. There are not enough beds as Mr. Murphy indicated. There's not enough wrap-around services. There's not enough care. And I was hoping that you might be able to touch on the importance of actually creating these incentives through Medicaid largely which is our largest mental health provider to actually make sure that not just another grant program but to make sure the incentives are in place to allow that marketplace to provide that care.

BURWELL: So, the bad news as you indicated there were 259 million prescriptions for pain killers, opioids during 2012. That's more than more than one per adult in the nation. That's the bad news. The good news is that I believe that there is bipartisan support for us to do something and I believe that that's both in the executive and the legislative branch here in Washington D.C. as well as with the governors who I met with over the weekend on this issue.

I think with regard to payment it is an important place but there are three fundamental things that we believe we need to work with the Congress and work with the governors to do. One is in terms of the prescribing that's at the root of much of the problem. We've seen progress in states like Florida where they are watching the prescribing, the plans that states can put in place to oversee that is an important part but we have a part, too.

Second is the issue of things like naloxone and access to those which I think gets to some the payment issues. And the third is making sure there's medical treatment and I think that was the third part of what you're mentioning.

Those three elements, I think is base -- that's the basic agreed upon and whether it's Senator Portman and Senator Wyden or Mr. Rogers (ph) or it's across the board there's bipartisan support because states from Massachusetts to Kentucky and West Virginia, my own home state, are suffering in devastating ways.

And the one piece you didn't mention which -- you know, is the economic impact. And having come from a large employer like Walmart, what it means in terms of having an employee (inaudible) that can pass a drug test.

KENNEDY: Thank you, Madam Secretary.

BURWELL: Thank you.

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman.

The Chair will note that we've just been joined by a group of students from the Houston area. The Ranking Member has informed me. You want to say anything, Gene?

GREEN: Mr. Chairman, I would like to recognize a number of our chiropractic students from the Houston area and Dr. Mossad (ph) who actually retired as a president of our Chiropractor College in Pasadena Texas. And I invited him last night because I wanted to show how health care policy is made in the Health Care Subcommittee. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

PITTS: Thank you. You're certainly welcome to be here.

The Chair now recognizes the Gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Griffith five minutes for questions.

GRIFFITH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate that. I appreciate the students being here. We may have some disagreements today but I will tell you that the Ranking Member, Mr. Green and I worked very hard on the health care bill that was -- that was signed into law last year. So, no matter what you may see today, we do get along more often than the press let you know.

All right, that being said, Madam Secretary, in response to a previous question, you indicated you weren't aware of any of the laws being signed in. I'm sitting here with the CRS report -- Congressional Research Service -- indicating that there are 12 bills that repealed parts of Obamacare that were in fact signed into law. You're not aware of that, is that correct in relationship to your previous answer.

BURWELL: With regard to the specifics to the answer those were repeal questions I thought.

GRIFFITH: Yes. And this was part...

BURWELL: Full repeal. Full repeal (inaudible).

GRIFFITH: ... he said -- he said full or part. So, you were mistaken, you weren't aware of these 12 that were partially repeals.

BURWELL: I was referring to the issue of full repeal (ph).

GRIFFITH: But you were aware of this?

BURWELL: With regard to that, I'd have to look and see (inaudible).

GRIFFITH: OK. And if I could have this entered into the record, I'd appreciate it.

PITTS: Without objection, so ordered.

GRIFFITH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Also, are you familiar with my H.R. 130?

BURWELL: I apologize. I don't know what that bill is. Maybe if it's described I might (inaudible).

GRIFFITH: And are you -- it's a bill that deals with the black lung provisions of Obamacare.

BURWELL: I'm not familiar with that.

GRIFFITH: I appreciate that. Are you familiar with my H.R. 790 which is the Compassionate Freedom of Choice Act?

BURWELL: I'm not familiar with the specific names of the legislation (inaudible).

GRIFFITH: And I appreciate that. And are you familiar with H.R. 793 which deals with Preferred Pharmacy Networks in Part D?

BURWELL: Depending on (inaudible) that may.

GRIFFITH: Another one of mine. And so, the reason I asked those questions is very well orchestrated today from my political standpoint, the other side of the aisle has asked you repeatedly are you aware of Republican legislation that deals with the issues that we're dealing with related to Obamacare, I would submit to you that in some way or another the three points that you pointed out, each one of those bills did, you're not intimately familiar with them and I understand that. And I'm not blaming you because you've been put into that unenviable position that sometimes happens where there's a difference between negative evidence and a lack of evidence.

And what you presented today is a lack of evidence and I appreciate that. That doesn't mean that these bills don't exist just as I gave you the numbers on those three. It doesn't mean that there aren't bills that other members have that are out there that are Republican proposals to take care of the American citizen while we are in the process of repealing Obamacare. And so, you're just submitting that you are not aware of it. But there are in fact bills out there that may be doing that ad also further discussions behind the scenes that may be doing that you're unaware of. Isn't that correct?

BURWELL: Would welcome the Veterans Bill -- there was a Veterans Bill that we all agreed on. The firefighters I haven't seen the legislation.

GRIFFITH: I'm just saying though that when you say -- when you say though in answer to many number of members on the other side of the aisle that you aren't aware that doesn't mean they don't exist. It just means you're not aware, am I correct? Yes.

All right. We'll move on. The president's fiscal year 2016 budget calls for $92 million for the Office of National Coordinator, ONC, for purposes including the transition to a governance approach for health information exchange.

In 2012, an HHS request for information noted that Congressional authorities granted to the ONC in the 2009 HITECH Act would support this governance mechanism. Madam Secretary, I hold in my hand the copy of a Congressional research report dated January 7, 2015 that suggests ONC does not have the authority to support the ONC governance structure outlined in the president's budget. Don't you agree that when agencies take action, they should be supported by Congressional authorization?

BURWELL: I'm not familiar with the report, would welcome seeing it. With regard to the Office of the National Coordinator, I think you know we just came out with the plan to continue moving us towards electronic medical records. We backed that up with specific things. We continue to work on something that cuts across many of the issues and whether (inaudible).

GRIFFITH: But you would agree with the principle that there ought to be Congressional authority for an agency to take action, would you not, yes or no?

BURWELL: I would agree that we need authority.

GRIFFITH: Yes, ma'am.

And. Mr. Chairman, if I can also have that Congressional research service report placed into the record (inaudible).

PITTS: Without objection, so ordered.

GRIFFITH: As a part of its governance push, ONC awarded a contract to RTI (ph) to develop its health IT safety center. RTI said at the time of the award that it would define the focus, functions, governance and value the national health IT safety content. I'm just concerned as I pointed out a minute ago that when you have these comments being made and we haven't seen it yet and the report that I just had entered into the record shows they haven't seen the final analysis of what they're going to do.

But when you have comments that they're planning to work on governance and they don't have that authority, I am concerned when the experts are telling me both legal and otherwise that this agency is going beyond its scope of authority, that this is a problem in this administration and that we should be careful that we have any agency moving forward without Congressional authority.

I'm going to ask you to work with me as we -- as we move forward on this. I'm going to follow up with some questions and some other things and ask that you work with me to make sure that the ONC does not overstep its authority granted to it in legislation by this Congress.

BURWELL: Would want to work with you to understand and understand what these concerns on governance are. This is new to me and so would like to understand further what the concern is.

GRIFFITH: Yes, ma'am. And I appreciate that and I yield back.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman.

I now recognize the Gentlelady from California, Ms. Capps five minutes for questions.

CAPPS: I thank my colleague for yielding any time and I do have a different topic to discuss with you, Secretary Burwell. But my colleague from Texas has asked for 10 seconds.

UNKNOWN: I'll do my 10 seconds. I want to thank the Congressman from Virginia. But I think the clarification is that up until Congressman Kennedy, all our statements were repeal the Affordable Care Act without an alternative. Now, there were bills that were passed and none of us at least up until Congressman Kennedy.

BURWELL: That's right.

UNKNOWN: But, you know, there's no repeal and replace. There's only repeal for (inaudible) 56 times. And thank you for my 10 seconds.

BURWELL: And that's why I responded to full repeal. It was...

CAPPS: Thank you. You know, I want to go back to the president's budget this year which I think on the whole strikes an important balance between controlling spending and promoting public health. And this public health topics are what I want to bring to your attention. I was pleased to see that there was continued support for nursing work force development. I believe and I know you do, too, a strong nursing work force improves the health of our communities as well as the quality of the health care system.

And we now have the significant challenge in our nation of caring for a growing patient population with limited resources. And I'm a nurse so I know that we can't reach our health care goals without a strong health care workforce made up of a range of health care professionals.

And these are the development programs such as Title VIII that are proven to be a solution that can help address this challenge. So, would you please discuss briefly because I have two more topics what this budget request does to make sure that we have a diverse health care workforce well equipped and large enough to meet our needs.

BURWELL: I will just be very brief...

CAPPS: Sure.

BURWELL: ... which is I think one of the core and anchor places that we do that is making sure that we are funding our national health service corps and the increases that we've asked for are very important part of that across, and it's especially important because we serve that group of people, 30 percent are diverse in that group.

CAPPS: Yes.

BURWELL: And in the nation as a whole, the number is 10 percent so we are over-indexing for that and that we think that's a very (inaudible).

CAPPS: Right (ph).

BURWELL: (inaudible) there are other things but I want (inaudible).

CAPPS: Right. And because this one that I'm going to mention is near and dear to my heart and that is the Maternal, Infant, and Early Childhood Home Visiting Program, such bang for the buck that you get with this who have ever seen it and I -- as I have and part of one. It's such a proactive and preventive service and there is an increasing commitment in this home visiting program in the budget for 2016. These are evidence based, as you know, bipartisan programs helping to ensure that all children across the board get an opportunity to be healthy and successful.

And they are so critical to improving health outcomes for both women and children and families. So my question is how increased funding for these programs is going to address disparity and improve the health. How can we make it better?

BURWELL: So with regard to the issue because I am a mother of a five and a seven-year-old I have lived the importance of that information very recently in terms of being able to give your children what they need. And so the program that you're describing why we think it's important to continue on the pace, it is an evidence-based program.

CAPPS: Yeah.

BURWELL: We have seen the results in terms of reading and other analytical skills up to 12 years old in terms of the benefits that's as far as it's been tested. And we see what that's happening when we give mothers and parents that opportunity to get the information they need in a home (ph). When you go to them, it is making the difference.

And so, we believe this is a very important part and part of a continuum that you see in the budget. That home visiting, next comes to that early childcare and making sure that we fund childcare so working Americans can be a part of that and then the issues of Head Start and improving Head Start both in terms of the length of day, the time of year and the quality that we require. So it is continuum in terms of making sure we're taking care of those children along the way for working families and pressing ourselves to improve quality.

CAPPS: And to build on that in the focus on children and family. This question was asked about graduate medical education, but I want to focus on children's hospital GME because children's hospitals programs are so critical for training pediatricians, pediatric specialists and pediatric researchers.

It's less than one percent of hospitals. They train 51 percent of all pediatric specialists and the Children's Hospital Graduate Medical Education Programs currently receive much less funding than other, you know, children don't lobby.

And we have to do this work on their behalf and would explain the proposed changes to funding for Children's Hospital Graduate Medical Education Programs and what steps are being taken to ensure that we are meeting the demand for pediatric care.

BURWELL: We want to meet that demand and we want to meet that demand for both primary care and the specialties where we don't necessarily have the number of practicing physicians that we need.

And so, the proposal that we have tries to respond to the criticisms that we received last year with our proposal and that there is a $100 million that is dedicated firmly to the children's programs.

In addition to that, they are able to compete. Right now, what we do is we cover the direct costs but we don't continue to cover the indirect cost.

CAPPS: Thank you very much.

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentlelady.

I now recognize the Gentleman from Texas Dr. Burgess for five minutes for questions.

BURGESS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Again, Madam Secretary, my apologies for being out of the hearing at another hearing. And I also apologize for not having the president's here with me this morning.

But the president did outline a number of savings in the Medicare space in the presidential budget. Is that correct? Do I understand that correctly?

BURWELL: Yes. That is correct.

BURGESS: And in general, as the head of HHS, are you supportive of those proposals by -- in the president's budget?

BURWELL: Yes.

BURGESS: Let me ask you a question then, you know that one of the things -- I mean, I have just been pounding my head against the wall for 12 years on the sustainable growth rate formula. We're very close last year.

We almost crack them up, but we didn't quite get there. But I thought we had a good proposal and we're very close to introducing the same policy language again in this Congress. Offsets (ph) have been -- have been difficult as everyone would expect.

So let me just ask you, those savings that the president identified -- those Medicare savings that the president identified in the presidential budget, do you think it would be a good idea to apply those savings for the permanent repeal of the sustainable growth rate formula?

BURWELL: With regard to how we pay for it in the president's budget, we pay for it -- it is within the baseline and we include it that way. With regard to the specific question of just using our approach to the Medicare, those savings are part of a broader context.

It is a budget and we put the budget together in its entirety. We view that those savings need to be paired with other elements of the budget.

BURGESS: But to the extent that those savers are identified, and those offsets are identified in the budget, it seems to me that is -- would perhaps be a reasonable place to begin the discussion of what are the offsets that are used to put in place for the permanent universal, complete, forever repeal of the sustainable growth rate formula.

BURWELL: First, I want to disagree with the content that we're talking about. In my opening remarks, I specifically said that we support the bipartisan bicameral concepts that were put forward. And so, on that we agree.

With regard to the question of offsets, why I started with how we do it, which is building it into the baseline is because that's the way we believe it should be done and that uses the balance of things that we use to pay for things in our entire budget.

So in terms of where we start and what we believe, we believe that it needs to be a range of things and not simply focused on those.

BURGESS: Yes, but at the same time, as you know, the difficulty with the sustainable growth rate formula is the budget baseline and the fact that it was built in years ago and it accumulates over time isn't ever corrected even though a number of patches (ph) have been passed by Congress, we basically paid for this damn thing at least 1.4 times over the past 12 years.

BURWELL: (inaudible) -- yes.

BURGESS: Again, I just want you to know that I like the fact that the president put forward cost savers in his budget. A fair warning to you that these are where I am going to go, the lack of participation in people who are willing to come forward and talk seriously about offsets leads me to go to the president's budget as the only place I can go for democratic ideas for an offset.

And that is -- that is one of the critical missing piece in getting this SGR settled. Let me ...

BURWELL: I think your colleague, actually though mentioned -- your colleague Mr. Pallone actually mentioned his specific idea for this one. He spoke to this issue. It was (inaudible), but -- and you may disagree with that, but that was (inaudible) in terms of contributing to the debate.

BURGESS: And my door is always open to Mr. Pallone, I await his invitation. I'll be glad to come to his office. Let me ask you a question. I know -- I know you probably are tired of hearing the King versus Burwell, but I'll bring it up to you one more time, since I haven't been here, it's not exhausting to me yet.

And the whole concept around contingency plans and the American Academy of Actuaries is concerned because insurance companies are supposed to disclose the data upon which they're basing their rates in May, but there could be something that changes the equation in June, so to the extent that the insurance companies are having to deal with this unsettled future, I mean, they are going to have to deal with contingency plans are they not.

Why should the department not have a contingency plan as recommended by the American Academy of Actuaries?

BURWELL: So with regards to things that I have authority to plan for, I will plan for. In the budget -- the current budget you see in front of you, the unaccompanied children issue one that I know is a difficult issue and that there's controversy around. We have put in monies to plan up to 60,000, have asked for contingency funding case.

We don't believe it will, but in case the numbers were there are places that I can plan, we will. With regards to this issue, that's why the letter was simple, it actually gets to the core and the fundamental.

We do not believe we have administrative authority if the court makes a decision and as I went -- I always repeat, we don't believe the court will decide this way, but if the court makes a decision that says and rules for the plaintiffs and says that those subsidies are not available, the question of we don't believe we have an authority to undo the damage that would then occur which is subsidies go away, individuals can no longer pay. They go off of their insurance. They become uninsured. It drives premiums up in that marketplace. They become uninsured. There's indigent care, it goes up.

We don't believe that we have an authority if the court makes that decision at that level that we have an authority to do it and therefore that's why you're not hearing (inaudible) plaintiffs because we don't have an authority.

BURGESS: Well, I think you have to agree, it will change the structure of the risk pools for the insurance companies. And Mr. Chairman, for that reason I'd like to submit the letter from the American Academy of Actuaries for the record and I yield back.

PITTS: Without objection, so ordered.

BURWELL: I do think though that is why one does see those companies filing their briefs that they have filed in the case that articulate the point you're making.

PITTS: The Gentleman yields back. The Chair recognizes the Gentleman from Maryland, Mr. Sarbanes for five minutes for questions.

SARBANES: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Madam Secretary. First, thank you for stepping into public service as you've done your tenure at OMB and now at HHS is I think a real service to the country.

I wanted to talk about this concept of full repeal which has been a drumbeat for years it seems now from the other side of the aisle to understand the implications of a full repeal. And so I wanted to go through some of the things that were part of the ACA and ask. And it may not be that every one of them is jeopardized for a full repeal. But I think, certainly, some of them are.

So the ACA included a measure that would allow young people to stay on their parents' health care up to age 26. And I think upwards of 3 million younger adults have benefited from that. If there was a full repeal at the ACA, would that benefit and provision be in jeopardy

BURWELL: It was part of the original act, so yes.

SARBANES: Then there was an effort to begin closing the doughnut hole on prescription drugs under the Part D program, which has bedeviled many of our seniors who kind of fall into that doughnut hole often at a critical stage in terms of being -- needing to access prescription drugs. And the ACA reform included an effort that's began, is under way to close that doughnut hole, would that be in jeopardy if there was a full repeal?

BURWELL: It would in the $15 billion in savings that their seniors have received to date would stop.

SARBANES: Right. Then there was terrific provisions in terms of reimbursement that benefits in reimbursement, so on the benefit side, for Medicare beneficiaries, you had more preventive care being covered fully, eliminating copayments for certain kinds of preventive care, screening for annual wellness visits, et cetera. That was part of the ACA. A full repeal, I imagine, would jeopardize that reform as well.

BURWELL: Yes. And we actually just were able to have the numbers. And we have seen an increase in the number of seniors that are using that preventative care and the percentage of seniors that are using at least one preventative service continues to go up.

SARBANES: Excellent. We put in some enhanced payment in reimbursement for primary care physicians recognizing that we need to make sure we're incentivizing that part of the profession in terms of getting into the pipeline. And also, having the opportunity to spend more time with their patients and having there be some economic reward for that, which the patients themselves also want, I presume that that would -- that would be imperiled with a full repeal as well.

BURWELL: A full repeal would imperil.

SARBANES: What about the provisions that have eliminated discrimination based on preexisting conditions, of course, we started right out of the gate eliminating that discrimination in the case of children, now that's been expanded more broadly. But I imagine that also would be undermined by a full repeal.

BURWELL: It would and having had the chance to meet a young woman who had cancer when she was seven -- when she was 12-years-old, she first had colon cancer and then had thyroid cancer later. And now is in her 20s and was engaged, but not continuing her graduate education or getting married because her focus was paying for her health care. And now the opportunity to have affordable care, because she had a preexisting condition, obviously, is now allowing her to go on with her life.

The issues of health security are very important, but for many individuals, the financial security is as well.

SARBANES: Thank you for those comments. The medical loss ratio requirement that now requires insurance plans to direct more of the insurance premium dollar to care as opposed to overhead cost and so forth, that was part of the ACA, adhering to that particular standard, that would be eliminated. I (inaudible) expecting a full repeal.

BURWELL: A full repeal.

SARBANES: Subsidies and tax credits for small businesses who want to do the right thing and provide health care coverage for their employees was part of the ACA, so small businesses would be impacted by a full repeal in terms of their ability to offer that kind of benefit to their workers. Isn't that correct?

BURWELL: It would take away the tax credits if there were a full repeal.

SARBANES: So even before we get to a discussion of the pros and cons of the health exchanges, which have now offered a coverage to millions of Americans. There are so many other reasons in addition to that that we wouldn't want to repeal the Affordable Care Act.

Thank you very much for being here. I appreciate your testimony.

BURWELL: (inaudible).

PITTS: The Chair thanks the Gentleman. I recognize the Gentleman from Florida, Mr. Bilirakis for his questions.

BILIRAKIS: (inaudible) so much for your testimony. Thanks for your appearance. Welcome. I want to talk about Medicare Advantage. According to 2012 data, there were about 145,000 seniors in my district, about 40 percent of them are on Medicare Advantage, a little higher than the national average.

They love their plans and they want to keep their plans. They love their benefits and their choices. Unfortunately, this administration may not love Medicare Advantage as much as my seniors.

This -- the actuarial firm of Oliver Wyman did an analysis of the proposed 2016 Medicare Advantage rate notice, reading the report I'm troubled to learn that it estimates the combined impacts of cuts from 2014 to 2016 will cost seniors on an average of $60 to a $160 a month or as much as $1,920 a year.

Many of the seniors in my district live on a modest income, fixed income. Why is the administration forcing many seniors to pay more than $100 a month to keep the plan they like?

BURWELL: So with regard to the issue of Medicare Advantage, first I want to say, we think the program is a good program. During the period when changes have been enacted, we've seen the program expand by, I think well over 40 percent. We've seen the number of Medicare Advantage plans that have the top two ratings go from 17 percent to 67 percent and we have seen that premiums have not been increasing in terms of the changes that we've done to date.

Why are proposing these changes is they have been recommended by MedPAC and others with regard to overcoding that's occurring and as part of our efforts to make sure we're using the taxpayer dollar wisely, we want to promote the program. We want to keep the program healthy, but we also believe that there are opportunities for those who may be not using the system as well as they might. And that's what our changes are about and that's what we're trying to do, preserve and build the system, but make sure we do it in a fiscally responsible way.

BILIKARIS: Thank you, Madam Secretary. Many seniors who like the Medicare Advantage program they have are going to lose it in the following years. In fact, a recent (inaudible) report details a nearly fourfold increase in the number of U.S. counties that no longer have Medicare Advantages as an option growing from 55 counties in 2012 to 211 counties in 2015.

Isn't it concerning to you that seniors are losing the ability to choose a Medicare plan that provides high quality in coordinated care? This is a very successful program and again this is extremely important to my constituents.

BURWELL: I agree that it is a very important program and we want to make sure that it continues. When I see the studies and the underpinning of that, the most recent numbers that I have seen are that 99 percent of beneficiaries have access. And so, those numbers may not align with that most recent study. I just want to understand what the difference in that is.

BILIKARIS: Thank you, Madam Secretary. One more question. The impact of seniors of Medicare Advantage according to Oliver Wyman could result in seniors losing access to their current coverage or facing higher premiums, reduced benefits and changing, again, changes to the network as a result of the cuts, the proposed cuts.

When I talk with seniors in my district about Medicare Advantage, again, they believe Medicare Advantage, the model offers high quality coordinated care. Yet, further cuts will disrupt the benefits upon which millions of seniors rely.

Your agency likes to tout the so-called the affordable premiums and better consumer choices under the Affordable Care Act, when it comes to Medicare Advantage wise administration pursuing policies that would increase premiums and reduce choices for seniors and again, it's very concerning.

BURWELL: I think the responses with regard to the issue that what we have seen with the changes we've done to date have not had the premium pressure that's described. We want to continue to watch and monitor. And also that we have seen more people enter in and the quality improve. And so, that's what we've seen to date. We want to continue to work and monitor. We want the program to succeed. We want to support it and we want to try and do it in the way that's the most fiscally responsible.

BILIKARIS: Well, thank you, Madam Secretary. I appreciate it.

I yield back, Mr. Chairman.

PITTS: (inaudible) Gentleman. I recognize the Gentleman from California, Mr. Cardenas for five minutes for questions.

CARDENAS: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I appreciate the opportunity to have this public dialogue for the benefit, not only of the members but for the public as well. Preserving access to prescription drugs that work for every senior is important. I think everybody on this dais and I think every person who cares about a senior in this country which probably makes everybody. So my question has to do with what proposals in the president's budget would increase access for seniors?

BURWELL: With regards to the specific access for seniors, across the board on prescription drugs, I think in terms of the programs, whether that's the way we use some of the programs we've just been discussing, but I also think one of the most important things that has happened is that seniors have access to preventative services that they historically may not have.

And just announced on Tuesday that what we are seeing is because the seniors have that access to those preventative services, they're increasing that -- the use of that. I think throughout our budget, one of the things we're attempting to do is work very hard to do a system -- delivery system reform which means getting better quality, at a better price for the nation.

And I recently announced about three weeks ago that in the Medicare space, we're going to try and move to 30 percent of all Medicare payments will be in new payment models, payment models that are about improving net quality and reducing net cost. And so those are some of the areas that I think the budget focuses on this.

CARDENAS: Now, that effort, is it likely to create an environment, individual by individual that's likely to increase their quality of extended life versus, because when we're talking about access to preventative care that means that if you catch something at its early stages, we all know with today's modern medicine and opportunities, you can actually thwart it or actually overcome it versus finding something at latent stages, it might even take your life. Correct?

BURWELL: And across the department there are number of investments to get to that. And whether that's the NIH investments in research or in the Center for Innovation in Medicare and Medicaid, one of the things where we have out, a proposal that we're getting response to have to do with hospice and curative care and how to combine those two in a way that will maximize for the quality of the patient. And so, it's throughout the budget, these issues of cost and quality are things that we focus on.

CARDENAS: Thank you. On that note, I'd also like to add, for the record, if you would allow me unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to submit the -- a letter for the record from my office that lays out the issues that we're discussing at the moment.

PITTS: Without objection, so ordered.

BURWELL: Thank you.

CARDENAS: I keep hearing a lot from some of my colleagues about their constituents losing choices. But then again, one of the things that -- it's my understanding, please clarify that when people are talking about losing choices, they may be describing policies that were, in fact, more expensive on the front end and perhaps didn't have minimum benefits standards to the person paying. Is that many cases what people are describing when people are losing choices?

BURWELL: It can be, I would want to understand the specific (inaudible) within the marketplace ...

CARDENAS: And that's why I say the word, "maybe, maybe," yes.

BURWELL: Within the marketplace there are 25 percent more issuers, which mean more choice. The essential health benefits do important things, I think as you're reflecting. And they get to some of the issues that, Mr. Murphy and Ms. Matsui on mental health and having those benefits be clear and incorporated is extremely important. So without understanding the specific case, I think it's a little hard to know.

CARDENAS: But there are, in fact, in some areas where certain kinds of policies are not allowed, but that was -- that is based on a new minimum standard, correct?

BURWELL: That is correct.

CARDENAS: And one of the things that I've discussed with some of my constituents and my staff and some of the providers and experts that we pulled together, we registered at least over 1,000 families.

And I personally tried to speak to as many of those individuals as possible. And with that is many of them were even scared to be there. They were thinking about this big Obamacare dragon that was going to obliterate either their finances or their health care, but what almost a person, every person that got up from once, they sat down and figured out what was available to them or what have you, had a big smile on their face.

And they were very pleased and very relieved and glad they came. And in one instance, I was talking to a Gentleman who was paying $60 a month. He was making $9 an hour, single-income family. He had a wife and a daughter. And I met all three of them.

And when he was done, he had a big smile in his face. He almost got up and left when he met me. But when he was done, he actually realized that he now was able to provide for his family, without having to spend $60 a month and now his entire family has coverage. So I think that's a perfect example of what this is, what's good in the Affordable Care Act.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield back my time.

PITTS: Thanks, Gentleman. I recognize the Gentleman from Indiana, Dr. Bucshon for five minutes for questions.

BUCSHON: Thank you, Secretary Burwell and thanks for coming. And first of all, I want to thank you for working with Governor Mike Pence of Indiana of helping the Indiana Plan 2.0, which will help to cover 350,000 low-income Hoosiers in a state based program that I think has been shown historically to not only save money, but it is very popular with the enrollees, so thank you very much for that -- for that work.

Before I came to Congress, I was a cardio-thoracic surgeon and I treated most of my patients for many weeks after their surgery. And as you probably know that falls on under a global payment, a 90-day global surgical payment by CMS. Now, CMS wants to repeal that rule and eliminate global payments for surgical services, why?

BURWELL: With regard to our understanding of how the global payments are used, the reason that we want to do this is make sure that while we are promoting quality care that we do it in the way that is most cost-effective for the tax payer. Most of the changes that we do in the Medicare space are focused on those two things and trying to balance those two things.

BUCSHON: OK. And has HHS or CMS looked into the administrative cost the new system we'll have on doctors and CMS? The reason I ask is in my practice, I'll give you some examples of how this actually won't work or won't work if you do it. We would bill a global payment for everything including follow up visits and now doctors will be billing for the surgery, every hospital round that they make, every follow up appointment, all separately, let me finish, and not only would the medical practice have to pay employees to submit all of these what I have considered excessive claims, but then, CMS will have to process each claim and how can that not cause CMS more money not less, that's my first question.

BURWELL: With regard to the global payment issue and one of the things Dr. Patrick Conway, we try and have physicians who are practicing at the table as we have these conversations. I want to understand the point that you're making in how we believe - I want to look into this one in terms of the specific answer to your question.

BUCSHON: It will be a dramatic increase. Let me tell you why, if I did an open heart surgery on a patient I would see them in the ICU anywhere from three to five days every day and then, probably two to three follow up appointments. That's all under global. And so now that those numbers will be submitted as individual bills, from a surgeon's perspective I see this is - and I think seniors should be paying attention to these comments. This is going to be a dramatic pay cut for surgeons across this country. And that's -- in my view, that's where any potential savings will be coming from.

So as you look at this you better - you should really - I would encourage you to pay attention to that because what will happen is you're going to have to re-evaluate, there's going to be a re- evaluation of every code, re-evaluation of every follow up appointment, you're going to have to discern whether there's duplicative billing. For example, if I see a patient post-op in the ICU and a critical care physician is also seeing my patient that day, who gets paid, who doesn't get paid, there will be increased denials. My point is this global payments were put in place to save money administratively and also simplify and I think improve quality of healthcare.

And I think going backwards away from that is regressive - regressing backwards. Yes, it will save money, this will save money by dramatically cutting provider reimbursement, and if that's the intent that's unfortunate because what will also result is access issues for seniors for healthcare services and I would argue less quality healthcare. And so, you know, most of these bundles are re- examined every few years by (inaudible) and so, you know, the argument that overbilling is occurring. If that were to be true, then, you know, these bundles are looked at every couple of years and re-evaluated. So, on that subject I would encourage you to take a really hard look at global payments. They save money. They don't cost money. The savings will be at the - on the backs of seniors' access to healthcare and quality in my opinion.

The other thing is the president's budget would seek to save 20.9 billion in savings over the next ten years by strengthening the IPAD (ph) board, a board of unelected members selected by the president to cut - in my view, to cut Medicare payments to providers. I understand the president has not yet nominated, anyone who sits on the IPAD (ph) board, so it would not - you could not recommend a Medicare cuts this year. So, in what year under the president's budget will IPAD (ph) begin to make recommendations on Medicare cost?

BURWELL: In the current president's budget, IPAD (ph) would not kick in until 2019.

BUCSHON: 2019.

BURWELL: That's correct.

BUCSHON: OK. Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

PITTS: The chair thanks the Gentleman. Now, I recognize the Gentleman from New York, Mr. Collins for five minutes for questions.

COLLINS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and thank you, secretary, for being here today. I'm from western New York which is a very rural community. We have one of the highest enrollment of Medicare Advantage.

I know prior to the Affordable Care Act I would say that without a doubt one of the bright spots in the delivery of healthcare in the United States was Medicare Advantage, dealt with the doughnut hole. It was a lot of comfort for the seniors to be able to go in much likely do at HMOs and great program and yet as was brought out earlier I want to get into this.

It seems as though the president and the administration in HSS views Medicare Advantage with some level of distain in that it's the piece that keeps getting cut. And as I look through some of the data and I'm kind of a data driven guy, the interesting thing I found about Medicare Advantage, there's over seven million enrollees who represents almost 30 percent of the Medicare population would indicate get works.

Number two, when you look at who uses it, lower income beneficiaries have a higher enrollment in Medicare Advantage than do wealthier individuals which means it's serving best some of the lower income populations. We've also seen that when I look at the rural plans, again, in rural America, which I represent, a higher percentage of folks from rural America area using it.

So, I'm just asking the question as - and the interesting thing too that that information we got today was from (inaudible), they said the current 0.9 percent, the 0.9 percent cut that's coming now in the subsidy to insurance companies for Medicare Advantage is going to add another $20 a month to beneficiaries either in higher premiums or reduced benefits. Could you speak to just the opinion of older Americans on Medicare that they are being used as the funding source for the extension of Medicaid and all of those increased cost in the back of seniors who depended on this great program through all these years? A frustration level exists within that population.

BURWELL: I appreciate that and as I responded to your colleague with regard to the issues of Medicare Advantage I would say we support the program, I believe the program is a good program, but I also believe that our responsibility where we think there are things that are happening whether that's upcoding or other things that we try and take care of that. The changes that we've done, we've tried to transition those changes. We try to do those changes slowly so that we watch and monitor. We've seen an increase in the number of people in Medicare Advantage. We have seen premiums hold steady, we've seen an increase in quality.

So the negative impacts that were articulated at the beginning of those proposals, we have not seen. We want to continue to monitor and make sure that we don't see some of the negative impacts that you are talking about. We value the program. We think the changes. They've been recommended by MedPac (ph) and others. We understand the concerns, but trying in a world, and with regard to the other issues that you mentioned I would just say across the board and whether it's the issue that your colleague just mentioned with regard to providers or the $780 million we do in discretionary cuts, we try to spread these things across the entire parts of our budget.

COLLINS: But are you aware that there are now over 200 counties in the United States that don't have a Medicare Advantage plan at all to offer their seniors as a direct result of the cuts you've made? So when you say it hasn't had this impact, there are seniors in 200, over 200 counties in the United States that can't even buy the coverage.

BURWELL: So 99 percent of the nation has coverage in terms of the beneficiary's accessibility.

COLLINS: But yet the number who don't has increased from 55 counties before the ACA to over 200 today. So, there's a direct impact, I mean, the numbers, the data is the data, you can't make it go away.

BURWELL: With regard to those numbers as I've said I have the number of the current coverage and would want to understand the change...

COLLINS: Yes, what I'm trying to point out is it has had - the reason you're looking for this funding is to pay for the expansion of Medicaid. I mean, whether it's the health insurance tax or the individual mandate or whatever, the big cost driver has been this huge expansion of Medicaid would be my observation.

BURWELL: What I would observe is some of the comments that have been stated about the question of overall entitlements and the growth, we have a bulge, a population we have a large group of people who are elderly in Medicare. The Medicare cost, even though we've controlled per capita cost for Medicare over the period of what we're seeing, because more people of from the baby boom are retiring and older, that's an issue that we as a nation are going to have to look at and deal with. Medicare costs are going to continue to increase because of volume even if we can control per capita cost.

And so with regard to the questions of what will be costing the nation money over periods of time, the issue of Medicare is one on a - because we're going to have the baby boom and the echo come through, we're going to continue to have to make good on the commitments we've made and that will cost us because even if you control it per capita, volume is greater.

COLLINS: Thank you for the answer. My time has expired. I yield back.

PITTS: The chair recognizes the Gentleman from New Mexico, Mr. Lujan for five minutes for questions.

LUJAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman and I would yield to our Ranking Member, Mr. Green for a quick response as well.

GREEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would respond to my colleague from New York. I don't - I've not had any of my seniors question the expansion of Medicaid based on what's happening with Medicare. The Affordable Care Act was totally paid for and, in fact, Medicare was improved under the Affordable Care Act. And Madam Secretary, if you just - this is the first I've heard that seniors are complaining that the Medicaid expansion is being paid out of Medicare. That's just - that's just not, in fact, that I hear about. Did you have any information on that?

BURWELL: That is the first that I've heard that anyone felt that that was an issue with regard to the federal budget, because I assume that's what they're referring to.

GREEN: Yes. The Gentleman would yield...

LUJAN: I'm reclaiming my time. Thank you, Madam Secretary for your testimony today. I want to reiterate what many of my colleagues have said, that we must repeal the SGR but not on the backs of seniors and that a strong CHIP extension must be included with the SGR in March as well.

Also that the Affordable Care Act is working despite in attempt of over 50 Republican repeal attempts. The ACA has had a positive impact on New Mexico, in my home state, in my home district, 25,000 people now have quality affordable health coverage because of the Affordable Care Act, it didn't before. And overall, the numbers of uninsured has declined by 17 percent.

With the law now fully in effect the Americans can never be discriminated against because of pre-existing conditions, women can never be charged more per coverage because of their gender and Americans will never be sold health insurance policies that disappear when they need coverage the most, when they hit those lifetime caps and suddenly coverage just goes away.

I think that it's time that we come together and work to strengthen the law and stop playing political games that will strip millions of Americans of their health coverage that they depend on. As my father would say, enough is enough. Madam Secretary, in your opinion has the Affordable Care Act had a positive impact on places around the country including my home state of New Mexico?

BURWELL: Yes. And I think it has in three areas, affordability, access, and quality. With regard to the issues of quality, you touched upon a number of the areas where I believe there's been an improvement in quality. And those are the fact that people can have their children covered up to 26, the quality that you don't, if you have a pre-existing condition, you can't be kept out or thrown off of your healthcare. The fact if you take your child in for their wellness visit, there isn't co-insurance so you don't have to pay in terms of that preventative care. So, increases in quality, we've also seen increases in quality through partnerships we're doing with physicians and we've seen a 17 percent reduction in harms.

Those are things like infections and falls and hospitals. That's also about saving lives but it's also about money. With regard to the issue of affordability and the progress that we've made on affordability, while we can all still continue to make more, we have in that space and what we've seen is that in the years 2011, '12, '13, we have seen a record in terms of per capita health care cost growth. It's one of the lowest that we've seen on record and we've seen that. That's in the broader marketplace. With regard to the individual market what we've seen is that people, the vast majority, over eight in ten folks in the marketplace can find coverage using a subsidy that is a $100 or less than a month. That's affordability in that marketplace.

With regard to affordability in the taxpayer, CBO estimates pre the Affordable Care Act would have estimated that spending in Medicare would have been $116 billion greater, affordability for the taxpayer.

Lastly, access, the question of access and the fact that 11.4 million people have come through the marketplace this time, but let's even use last year's number where we saw a 10 million person drop in the number of uninsured. So, against the three fundamental measures, that's how I would think about it.

LUJAN: I appreciate, Madam Secretary, thanks for your response there and I do want to raise an issue that's great concern to my constituents and to myself back in New Mexico. It's now been over 18 since the state of New Mexico claimed credible allegations of fraud or their allegations of fraud against 15 behavioral health providers resulting in the eventual closure or replacement by five Arizona behavioral health providers.

This transition and turmoil has raised significant concerns across access to care, especially in light of recent reports that the new providers are financial unstable. In fact, one provider is already pulling out of New Mexico. The recent elected New Mexico Attorney General has also released the audit that led to the suspension and it shows a lack of underlying basis for many of the allegations of fraud.

My staff has had several meetings with CMS and I'm very concerned that we are making progress. When payment suspensions are put into place what can CMS do to ensure states are acting in good faith and what is the CMS doing to stop the reoccurrence of this happening both in New Mexico and other states? And can I have your commitment that we can work together on this particular issue to meet with the delegation?

BURWELL: We do want to work with you on this issue. You know it is one of concern in terms of making sure that people have access to those benefits.

LUJAN: I appreciate that. Thank you very much. I yield back the balance of my time.

PITTS: The chair thanks the Gentleman. I recognize the Gentlelady from North Carolina, Ms. Ellmers for five minutes for questions.

ELLMERS: Thank you. And thank you, Madam Secretary, for being with us today. I'm sorry, do you get some water there? We should get you some water. I do want to address before - because I have three different very different questions to ask you about, but I do want to address the issue of Medicare and our seniors who are concerned. It is my recollection and, you know, there again I'm just going back to history that over $700 billion was taken out of Medicare in order to pay for Obamacare, about 300 billion of that was Medicare Advantage. So the question of whether or not our seniors are concerned about that, I would say yes, they are concerned about that and they want to make sure that they will be able to continue to get the good care that they deserve.

I do want to start off by talking about Medicare reimbursement in relation to the 2 percent sequester cuts that were put in place a number of years ago dramatically affecting our chemotherapy drugs and our other part B drugs. As you know this has this has - this has affected our industry, back in January 14th of 2013 the Office of Management and Budget put out a letter basically asking federal agencies to "use any available flexibility to reduce operational risks and minimize impacts of the agency's core mission and service of the American people" and it goes on.

Some of the adverse things that have happened as a result of the 2 percent cut, over 16 months after CMS started applying the 2 percent cut, we basically ended up with 25 community oncology clinics closing. One of which, a very large clinic in my own district and 75 others merged with hospitals. CMS's own numbers showed that it cost $6,500 more per year per patient on oncology services if they become part of the hospital system versus the clinic setting or outpatient setting and about $650 more out of pocket. How can, you know, why hasn't CMS taken the recommendation of OMB and addressed that situation?

BURWELL: Congresswoman, we agree with you about sequester and in this budget we fully get rid of sequester both on the mandatory side and on the discretionary side. We believe there are other choices that are better choices and so I agree with you, this is not an approach, when you use an approach like this you'd end up doing things like the types of things you're talking about. And so what we want to do is fully replace it and that's what our budget does. We are willing to make other choices in terms of how we get those savings.

ELLMERS: Thank you. And I'll just go on in this - there again, a very important question having to do essentially with our tobacco products. And I - my question for you is do you agree with Mitch Zeller, the director of FDA Center for Tobacco Products that if smokers and I'm going to quote him, "who are otherwise unable or unwilling to quit were to completely switch to smokeless tobacco product it will be good for the public health." Do you agree with the statement?

BURWELL: I would have to understand the context in which he made that statement. With regard to the question, I think, you know, we want to promote the public health, we want to make sure we're doing the right research to understand that and put the right guidelines and regulations to do it.

ELLMERS: Well, thank you for that and I do want to add there that there are no government websites that help promote or, you know, address this issue including CDC, FDA, NIH. It would be helpful again for the public to understand that there are the non-tobacco products available and that this is an approach that we need to make. And I would welcome the ability to continue to work with you and in your office on any way that we can, you know, better help to get that information out and address the need from a scientific basis and using the scientific research that's out there.

I do want to switch gears a little bit to our vaccines and to BARDA. Right now BARDA maintains a stock pile of roughly $1.7 billion worth of pandemic influenza vaccine. This year's budget I believe was about $20 million in order to take care of that stockpile and maintain it. Does the 2016 budget increase that amount and into the future how does BARDA plan on dealing with those issues, especially when we know that we are in our situation where this is - its a very timely issue.

BURWELL: Across the board our budget has worked to do a couple of things with regard to the preparedness, making sure that that vaccine stockpile and that the issues that BARDA handles which are making sure that we have what we have on hand and stock pile and that we have the ability to work with manufacturers to bring new products online where that's appropriate for different types of issues that we as a nation may face, either manmade or otherwise.

But we also have paired that with things in our budget which are about the preparedness in our communities and we've seen that front and center certainly in our own time period. We are implementing the dollars we appreciate from Congress as part of in terms of Ebola that also broader preparedness where we have been given that authority by the Congress.

ELLMERS: Thank you, Secretary Burwell, for being here today. I truly appreciate your input. Thank you.

PITTS: The chair thanks the Gentlelady. That concludes the questions of the members of who are present. I'm sure we'll have lots of follow up and written questions from some of the members. So, we'll get those to you promptly, we ask that you please respond to the questions promptly. I remind the members that they have 10 business days to submit questions for the record and that means they should submit their questions by the close of business on Thursday, March the 12.

Thank you very much, Madam Secretary, for your attendance today and your answers. And without objections the subcommittee is adjourned.

LUJAN ON DHS FUNDING: 'TIME FOR CONGRESSIONAL REPUBLICANS TO STOP PUTTING THEIR POLITICAL SECURITY AHEAD OF NATIONAL SECURITY'

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 456 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, D.C.

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District spoke on the House floor this morning on importance of passing a clean funding bill to prevent the Department of Homeland Security from shutting down. Below are his remarks.

"Mr. Speaker, we are only days away from a shutdown of the Department of Homeland Security. When Republicans took control of the House and Senate they pledged to avoid more government shutdowns. Instead, we've sadly learned that Speaker Boehner and Leader Mitch McConnell went nearly two weeks - two weeks - without talking and their failure to govern has us once again on the brink of a shutdown.

"I have been shocked and disappointed to hear some of my Republican colleagues say that a shutdown of the Department of Homeland Security would not be a serious issue and try to minimize its impact on people, minimize its impact on workers, and even try to minimize its impact on America.

"In my home state of New Mexico, a border state where we have many men and women who proudly serve our country as employees of the Border Patrol, the TSA, and other agencies, getting furloughed or working without a paycheck is a serious issue. If Republicans continue down this path paychecks will stop but rent and mortgages and utility bills for these workers will not.

"Time and again House Republicans have failed to govern, moving only from one crisis to the next. Sadly, the failure to fund DHS is the latest manufactured crisis that will have a real impact on working families in New Mexico and across America, while needlessly putting our national security at risk.

"It's time for Congressional Republicans to stop putting their political security ahead of national security and pass a clean bill. It's time for House Republicans to stop catering to the extreme anti-immigration wing of their party that is willing to sacrifice our nation's security in order to attack DREAMers who are going to college and serving our great nation.

"Mr. Speaker, the eyes of the American people are watching this Republican-led Congress, and so far all they have seen is gridlock and dysfunction.

"Mr. Speaker, the United States Senate is moving forward to fund the Department of Homeland Security. House Democrats are ready to support a clean bill. The only ones standing in the way of preventing a Department of Homeland Security shutdown are House Republicans. For our country's sake let us hope that changes.

"Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House bring up H.R. 861, the clean Department of Homeland Security funding bill that will keep the Department open so it can carry out its mission of keeping the American people safe."

HOMELAND SECURITY SHUTDOWN LOOMS LARGE FOR NEW MEXICO;
Paychecks for workers would be disrupted

LENGTH: 1046 words

WASHINGTON - U.S. Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson warned Tuesday that a stalemate over the department's budget threatens millions of dollars in federal law enforcement and disaster grants in New Mexico and other states, as well as the paychecks and morale of the agency's 240,000 employees nationwide.

DHS employees deemed "essential," such as Border Patrol officers, Transportation Security Administration agents and Secret Service employees, would still be required to come to work under law, but would not be paid unless Congress agreed to make the U.S. Treasury Department cut checks retroactively. At the end of previous government shutdowns, federal workers have been issued back pay.

In New Mexico, paychecks for 2,302 full-time employees of the Department of Homeland Security would be disrupted. About 1,700 New Mexico-based DHS employees would be required to report to work without pay.

At odds over President Barack Obama's executive order granting legal status to 5 million people now in the country illegally, Democrats and Republicans on Capitol Hill remained deadlocked over the agency's $60 billion budget Tuesday, with funding for the department set to expire at midnight Friday.

The department would run out of money on Sunday and begin to shut down - at least partly - next week.

The Republican-controlled House has passed a DHS spending bill that would pay for DHS operations but also block Obama's executive action providing legal status to some 5 million people now in the country illegally. The Republican-controlled Senate does not have the votes to override a Democratic filibuster and pass the House legislation. Even if it did, Obama has threatened to veto the bill.

"Approximately 75 to 80 percent of our workforce will be required to come to work without pay for the duration of the shutdown," Johnson said during a meeting with regional reporters at the White House. "Approximately 30,000 members of our workforce will be furloughed, and that includes lots of headquarters personnel. That has a concrete effect on our ability to do the job."

Johnson also warned that millions of dollars in grants to local law enforcement and emergency management agencies could be jeopardized largely because no one would be on the job at DHS headquarters in Washington to process them.

"It makes absolutely no sense and it puts our state at risk," Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., said in a conference call with reporters Tuesday. "It put people who are in New Mexico and doing a good job on security issues in a very difficult situation."

"If DHS shuts down, it's not fair to punish employees and their families by forcing them to go without pay," Udall said, adding that he is cosponsoring a bill introduced Tuesday that would ensure DHS employees continued to receive paychecks in the event of a shutdown.

The fate of that legislation in a highly contentious Congress was unclear at best.

In New Mexico, the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center in Artesia would close until the budget impasse was resolved. About 350 students training at the Artesia school would be sent home, and about 450 officers and agents would go without paychecks. Federal payments to outside contractors working at the Artesia training center could be delayed.

"A delay in training would have impacts on the security of the nation's borders, aviation security, protecting our nation's leaders and diplomats, safeguarding the United States Capitol and other federal buildings, and other federal law enforcement activities," said a message posted on the FLETC website Tuesday.

Jay Mitchell, secretary-designate of New Mexico's state Department of Homeland Security, said his office is closely tracking the federal funding impasse with pronounced concerns about lost paychecks and federal grants to the state.

"The first concern of mine and of the Governor's Office is that we've got over 2,300 New Mexicans employed by DHS," Mitchell said in a Journal interview. "That's a lot of New Mexico families that will be impacted by this."

Mitchell also said he's worried that federal grants owed to New Mexico cities and towns for wildfires and flooding could go unallocated. Many of those local jurisdictions have already paid for the disaster response and are waiting for checks from the federal government.

"We will lose all of our administrative support for handling reimbursements for fires and flooding that affected a lot of small communities," he said. "These communities and contractors can't afford that."

Johnson confirmed that assertion at the White House on Tuesday. "DHS grants to state and local law enforcement around the country grinds to a halt," he said.

Shawn Moran, spokesman for the National Border Patrol Council, the employee union for Border Patrol officers, said a DHS shutdown would damage employee morale and would be counterproductive to protecting the border.

"We feel that we're a political football and we're caught in the middle of this," Moran said. "It's easy to say we're going to defund a department because you disagree with the president's actions, but that defunding has real-world consequences. Defunding the agency that provides border security is counterintuitive and doesn't make sense. To punish people who are putting their lives on the line, it's dishonorable."

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., voted for the House bill that Obama has threatened to veto but said he does not support blocking the DHS budget.

"I do not oppose DHS funding," Pearce said. "The bill that we sent over to the Senate fully funds the Department of Homeland Security. The House responded to the people's demands, passing a DHS bill to block the president's unconstitutional executive order. The Senate does not need to pass the bill unchanged, but they must act."

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., said Republicans should pass a "clean" bill that is not tied to Obama's immigration actions.

"If Republicans continue down this path, paychecks will stop, but rent, mortgages, and utility bills for these workers will not," Luján said.

"The risks that are currently facing the United States are serious and we should not be playing partisan games when it comes to the security of our nation," said Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M.

Journal staff writer Lauren Villagran in Las Cruces contributed to this report.

Days remaining in session: 29

Homegrown lab management: Northern New Mexico's representative in Congress called on the state Legislature to lead a movement toward homegrown management of the national laboratories in the state.

Addressing a joint session on Thursday, U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., said lucrative federal contracts to manage Los Alamos National Laboratory and Sandia National Laboratory, in particular, present a unique economic development opportunity in the financially struggling state. He said the Legislature should explore ways to assemble a consortium capable of managing the labs.

Sandia's management contract is in the process of being rebid, and the contract with Los Alamos National Security, the private contractor that manages LANL, expires Oct. 1, 2017.

U.S. Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., addressed the Legislature on Tuesday and urged bipartisan cooperation. He emphasized the importance of oil and gas to the state's economy. On Wednesday, in another joint session of the Legislature, U.S. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., touched on the woeful state of behavioral health care in the state.

Extracting New Mexico from its economic malaise was common theme in the congressional delegates' speeches. Luján said it's time for the state to chart a new economic path. "New Mexico is at a crossroads ... ," he said. "The signs of economic recovery are all around us, but yet seem to be passing us by."

Breaking fast: Native New Mexican and critically acclaimed actor Steven Michael Quezada and his wife, Cherise, ordered breakfast burritos with avocado, his with green chile, at the Roundhouse cafeteria on Thursday.

Quezada, who portrayed federal agent Steven Gomez in the series popular TV series Breaking Bad, was at the Capitol to track education issues in his capacity as a member of the Albuquerque school board.

Webcast archives killed: The House Appropriations and Finance Committee on Thursday voted down a proposal to archive internet videos of legislative committee hearings. On a party-line 7-5 vote, with Republicans in opposition, House Resolution 2, sponsored by Rep. Jeff Steinborn, D-Las Cruces, was tabled.

Currently, committee hearings are broadcast online during the legislative session, but they are not archived. Gov. Susana Martinez's office webcasts selected proceedings, including floor sessions of the House and Senate, which are archived on the governor's website.

After voting down the bill to archive committee hearing webcasts, the House Appropriations and Finance Committee approved a separate measure, House Concurrent Resolution 1, also sponsored by Steinborn, to webcast interim committee meetings when feasible, but without archiving them. That proposal received a "do pass" recommendation on a unanimous vote. Next, it moves to the House Rules and Order of Business Committee.

Stay away: The House on a 66-0 vote Thursday passed legislation that would allow rape victims to ask judges to impose permanent restraining orders against their convicted attackers.

Racheal Gonzales of Grants has been the public face of House Bill 123. Her biological father was sentenced to prison for raping her when she was a child. She has told legislative committees that for victims, the periodic expiration of restraining orders is at best inconvenient, and at worst terrifying.

The bill now moves to the Senate.

Looking ahead: The House Appropriations and Finance Committee is scheduled to consider a revised state budget proposal that reflects a downward turn in revenue expectations, driven by falling oil prices, during its meeting at 8:30 a.m. Friday in Room 307.

o U.S. Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., is scheduled to take his turn in addressing state legislators at 10:15 a.m. Friday. His office said Udall "will call on lawmakers to work together and focus on improving the well-being of New Mexico's children."

o KNME-TV's public affairs show New Mexico in Focus will air a segment Friday asking state lawmakers how they are trying to help children and families. Among scheduled guests for the broadcast, which airs at 7 p.m. on Channel 5.1 and repeats at 7 a.m. Sunday, are Rep. Gail Chasey, D-Albuquerque, Sen. Gay Kernan, R-Hobbs, and Sen. John Sapien, D-Corrales.

Quote of the day: "That's an applause line." -- U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., when a joint session of the Legislature greeted his proclaimed support for economic development initiatives with silence.

Udall speaks against right-to-work, urges more funds for early education

BYLINE: PATRICK MALONE, THE NEW MEXICAN

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 10

LENGTH: 402 words

U.S. Sen. Tom Udall used his pulpit during a joint session of the New Mexico Legislature on Friday to weigh in on two of the most divisive issues facing state lawmakers this session.

He spoke out against so-called "right-to-work" legislation and expressed support for a measure that would let voters decide whether to tap into the state's savings to expand early childhood education.

Pointing out the state's poor rankings on child wellbeing, Udall, a Democrat, announced his support for Senate Joint Resolution 5. The measure would ask voters whether to devote a larger part of the state's multi-billion-dollar Land Grant Permanent Fund to early childhood programs.

"I support the constitutional amendment to dedicate a portion of the permanent fund to improving child well-being," Udall said. "Let's take it to the voters. Let them decide."

Some conservative Democrats have joined Republicans in the Legislature to defeat similar proposals in recent years. They have objected to depleting the state's savings.

Udall also blasted House Republican-sponsored legislation that aims to prohibit union membership as a condition of employment, commonly known as right-to-work.

"I urge you to resist wasting time on quick fixes that sound good, but that hold back hardworking New Mexico families," Udall said. "Right-to-work laws won't make child care more available for working moms in Guadalupe; they won't build a strong high-tech workforce in Albuquerque or ensure farmers in Luna County can find a market for their chiles and wine."

Pat Garrett, spokesman for the House Republicans, fired back at Udall's criticisms of the right-to-work proposals.

"It's no surprise that a poster child of Washington dysfunction would proudly preach gridlock and call a common-sense compromise a waste of time," Garrett said.

Udall's speech concluded a week filled with joint sessions of the Legislature featuring addresses from New Mexico's congressional delegation. Already, lawmakers had heard from U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce, a Republican, and Michelle Lujan Grisham and Ben Ray Luján, both Democrats.

Udall said partisan bickering only stands to derail the Legislature's efforts to turn around the state's economy.

"New Mexico does not have the luxury of gridlock. Trust me. You do not want to go down that road," he said. "I've seen it in Washington. The gridlock road is a bumpy road. It's not a fun road. Don't go down that road."

New Mexico: Lujan Delivers Address to New Mexico Legislature

LENGTH: 2168 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District addressed a joint session of the New Mexico Legislature this afternoon. Below are his remarks as prepared.

"To the distinguished members of the New Mexico House of Representatives, the New Mexico Senate, Governor Martinez, Speaker Tripp, President Pro-Tem Papen, tribal leaders, honored guests, family, and friends, thank you for welcoming me here today to discuss our shared commitment to the people of New Mexico and our common goal of building a brighter future for the New Mexico families we are so honored to represent.

"It is always a pleasure to be back in this distinguished chamber, a body that has such a special place in my heart and my family's as well. Thank you for allowing me this honor.

"Growing up and watching Dad serve in this body with my Mom always at his side, I have seen first-hand, how important it is to be the voice for those whose voices are often not heard. I saw the strength of our state and our legislature when New Mexico working families and growing the economy were at the top of everyone's priorities.

"From all around America to right here in the Roundhouse to every community across the Land of Enchantment, that should be our North Star - our mission as elected officials - fighting to grow our economy for each and every constituent we are fortunate to represent.

"As a state and a country, we cannot reach our full potential without a vibrant middle class. That means working day in and day out to ensure every New Mexican has a good-paying job, food on the table, an education for their children, living their golden years with dignity, and putting a little money in the bank at the end of the month.

"I am not naïve. I know that for too many New Mexicans, this vision feels like it's slipping away. I've sat across from many kitchen tables in many homes across New Mexico and looked into many parents' eyes and seen the hurt and fear as they struggle to provide the next meal for their children.

"Our vales demand more. I've talked to many New Mexicans who have spent too many days in search of too few jobs. We all know that New Mexicans deserve better.

"The national economy is gaining speed. The stock market is up, the private sector has added jobs for 59 straight months - the longest streak on record - but these gains are not being felt in homes across New Mexico.

"We must ask ourselves the tough questions and look within to find out why our neighboring states are growing, but New Mexico remains near the bottom. New Mexico leads the nation in child hunger and is near the bottom of childhood wellbeing. We cannot ignore these challenges. We cannot focus on small issues for political gain that sometimes distract us while the larger ones remain unaddressed.

"We cannot let our differences stand in the way of progress. Now is not the time for politics. Now is the time for helping New Mexico's families. As we begin a new Congress and work through our legislative session here at home, I hope that we can work in concert to address these challenges. I hope that we can work together on middle-class economics and offer struggling families a chance to build a brighter future here at home.

"The hard-working men and women of New Mexico are the backbone of our communities and our economy. We should be working to expand economic opportunities, create jobs and grow paychecks. To do this we must diversify our economy by taking advantage of New Mexico's unique resources.

"The federal labs are one of these resources that set us apart from states all across America. Three world-class labs in New Mexico create tremendous possibilities, but we must do more to leverage the labs to drive economic growth and job creation.

"Too many dollars that are coming to New Mexico are simply passing through and not staying here at home. An essential part of that effort is improving coordination between all the stakeholders who have an important role to play. We need a holistic approach with labs, local businesses, investors, the education community, and more all working together toward a common goal that is putting New Mexico first.

"Understanding the needs of the labs and the skills they value will help educators tailor a curriculum and job training toward those needs. Working with local businesses there can be internship and fellowship programs that provide valuable experience to prepare New Mexico's workforce. With the right focus we can attract and educate workers with the skills that then entice more businesses to set up shop in our communities - building an ecosystem around the labs that establishes a workforce pipeline and broader pool of capabilities to draw on.

"We need coordination that ensures that these efforts work in concert with our tax structure to incentivize growth in key areas. On this point I want to commend all the members of the New Mexico Legislature, the Governor, and the Jobs Council for their support of tax credits for Angel investors and research and development. That is good for New Mexico and it will put people to work. These are tools that can support startups and innovative businesses here in New Mexico that jumpstart our economy.

"At the federal level, I have been advocating for increased funding for the Small Business Innovation Research program and the Small Business Technology Transfer program. These programs encourage small businesses to engage in research and development, expanding public/private partnerships to include joint venture opportunities for small business and nonprofit research institutions, enabling them to collaborate with federal research institutions in an effort to bring technological innovations to the marketplace.

"I am also working with the Department of Energy and the National Nuclear Security Administration to encourage them to implement programs that bring together DOE and the Department of Commerce to engage businesses, venture equity, angel investors, universities, and regional entrepreneurs to develop capabilities the labs and the region need.

"As we look to the future of the labs and the impact they have on New Mexico, I believe that we should seek a greater role in shaping that future. The Sandia Management and Operation Contract is in the process of being solicited and re-bid and Los Alamos National Lab's contract will be here before we know it.

"We as a state should set a goal of having a New Mexico-led consortium as prime contractor for one or both of our national labs. If not in this next round, then certainly in the next. It will change the way those dollars flow through New Mexico, having New Mexico at the front of what will be happening day in and day out.

"I encourage the legislature to consider a joint memorial to bring together legislative leaders, the Governor, universities, and the business community to study how we make this happen so that New Mexico can take a leadership role in the operations of New Mexico's national labs.

"In addition to our labs, New Mexico is home to a wealth of natural resources. Wind and solar hold the potential to power our economy. Building a clean energy economy that turns these resources into jobs will be vital for the future of New Mexico.

"This Congress I will introduce legislation to promote increased investments in clean energy through a renewable energy standard that reduces carbon emissions and drives clean energy deployment in states around the country. By increasing the amount of renewable energy that our neighbors use, we can create more demand to export New Mexico's wind and solar. This means making transmission a key focus and encouraging more projects like SunZia throughout New Mexico so that we can move our clean energy into new markets. We can create these opportunities and protect New Mexico's assets, and we must commit to both.

"As New Mexicans, we are blessed by our surroundings with majestic lands that are some of the most beautiful in the world. We are home to the best hunting, fishing, and hiking. This is not only a great source for recreation; it is a major economic driver creating jobs in communities across the state.

"New Mexico's farmers grow crops that are a vital part of our economy as well as our culture, from pistachios to chile. It's these lands that truly make us the Land of Enchantment and it is why we must work to preserve them and support the farmers whose value-added products are the best in the world.

"While our lands, our crops, and our Carne Seca and chile are important, the most important and most treasured resource is every man, woman, and child who calls New Mexico home, who are determined, who are resilient. With the contributions from the Hispanic, Native American, Anglo, African American, and immigrant communities, to our soldiers, veterans, and military families who make us proud, our great diversity is a strength and we must embrace and celebrate it every day.

"With deep roots and a love for our land that has been home to so many generations of New Mexicans, our people are what make our state so strong. But we must invest in our greatest resources, our people. We must educate our children from their earliest days and get them on the right path from the very beginning. I will continue to support efforts at the federal level to expand access to Head Start and other early education programs that help children during their formative years, and I encourage you to take action here in New Mexico.

"With our children ranking near the top of every bad list, we must do something to break this cycle. The Land Grant Permanent Fund was created to invest in New Mexico, to help create wealth, to pave the way for positive education. What better place than in our children's future to invest?

"The challenges we face run deep. But that can't be an excuse for inaction. In fact it calls for bold action. Universal access to education is a must.

"Affordable higher education and access to job training programs must also be part of the equation. Too many students are drowning in debt, not being able to get into their first home, and sometimes not even being able to buy their first car. This is a challenge we can attack together.

"As we grow our economic sectors, we need skilled workers who are prepared for the jobs of the future. In his state of the Union Speech, President Obama called for more access to community college. I agree with the President that our community colleges can lead the way in an effort to provide a good education to all those who want to work hard.

"This Congress I will be introducing legislation to leverage our community colleges and to help them strengthen their clean energy curriculum so they can prepare students and retrain workers for careers in clean energy. By providing grants to community colleges to expand programs that focus on workforce development in this growing field, we can give students the tools they need to get ahead.

"Investing in the people of New Mexico so that we grow the middle class and combat the cycle of poverty is the key to a brighter future. What we should not do is weaken workers' ability to advocate for good wages and safe working conditions.

"As many of you know, we lost my Father to lung cancer over two years ago. Dad was an iron worker who worked up at Los Alamos and the conditions he worked in contributed to his diagnosis.

"Worker safety, ensuring that there are protections so that workers come home safe and sound every night to their family and are not impacted decades later, is of critical importance. And it is a top priority for the unions that fight for working men and women.

"Whether its workplace safety or fair wages, a 40-hour week or overtime pay, unions fought for many protections we now take for granted. That is why undermining our workers through policies that undermine working families would do more harm than good and will take New Mexico in the wrong direction.

"I am hopeful that instead we work together on areas that will strengthen working families, rebuild our economy, and create more opportunities for the people of New Mexico.

"New Mexico is at a crossroads. We have struggled through the deepest recession in a generation. The signs of an economic recovery are all around us, yet seem to be passing us by. The choices we make today will determine if we continue along this road or if we chart a new course that puts us back on the path to prosperity.

"My Father, Speaker Luján said: 'We should never give up. We must preserve in our pursuit to do good, make a difference, and treat every man, woman, and child with respect and dignity.'

"To each and every one of you, I wish you well. I wish you courage and wisdom. May God bless each and every one of you and keep you safe. May God bless New Mexico and may God bless America.

New Mexico: Lujan Introduces RECA Legislation to Expand Compensation for Those Exposed to Radiation

LENGTH: 869 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District introduced legislation in the House of Representatives today that expands compensation for those exposed to radiation while working in uranium mines or living downwind from atomic weapons tests. Companion legislation has been introduced in the Senate by a bipartisan coalition of Senators, including New Mexico Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich.

Among the provisions in the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act (RECA) Amendments of 2015 are much needed changes that would build upon previous RECA legislation by further widening qualifications for compensation for radiation exposure; qualifying post 1971 uranium workers for compensation; and expanding the downwind exposure area to include Colorado, Idaho, Montana, and New Mexico, as well as any county in Arizona, Nevada, or Utah, which has been shown to be impacted by downwind contamination.

"Until this gets done - compensating and recognizing the miners, workers, downwinders and all who are suffering from the impacts of uranium mining and nuclear testing during the Cold War - we will continue to push this legislation forward," Congressman Luján said. "I will continue my efforts to educate my colleagues in the House on the critical need to compensate all those who played a key role in our national security during the Cold War and have suffered as a result of their efforts."

Specifically, the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act Amendments of 2015 will:

o Extend compensation to employees of mines and mills employed after Dec. 31, 1971. These are individuals who began working in uranium mines and mills after the U.S. stopped purchasing uranium, but failed to implement and enforce adequate uranium mining safety standards. Many of these workers have the same illnesses as pre-1971 workers who currently qualify for RECA compensation.

o Add core drillers to the list of compensable employees, which currently only includes miners, millers and ore transporters.

o Add renal cancer, or any other chronic renal disease, to the list of compensable diseases for employees of mines and mills. Currently, millers and transporters are covered for kidney disease, but miners are not.

o Allow claimants to combine work histories to meet the requirement of the legislation. For example, individuals who worked half a year in a mill and half a year in a mine would be eligible for compensation. Currently, the Department of Justice makes some exceptions for this, but the policy is not codified in law.

o Make all claimants available for an equal amount of compensation, specifically $150,000, regardless of whether they are millers, miners, ore transporters, onsite employees, or downwinders.

o Make all claimants eligible for medical benefits. Currently, only miners, millers and ore transporters can claim medical benefits through the medical expense compensation program.

o Recognize radiation exposure from the Trinity Test Site in New Mexico, as well as tests in the Pacific Ocean.

o Expand the downwind areas to include all of Arizona, Nevada, New Mexico, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, and Utah for the Nevada Test Site; New Mexico for the Trinity Test Site; and Guam for the Pacific tests.

o Allow the use of affidavits to substantiate employment history, presence in affected area, and work at a test site. Current legislation only allows miners to use affidavits.

o Return all attorney fees to a cap of 10 percent of the amount of the RECA claim, as was mandated in the original 1990 RECA legislation.

o Authorize $3 million for five years for epidemiological research on the impacts of uranium development on communities and families of uranium workers. The funds would be allocated to the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences to award grants to universities and non-profits to carry out the research.

o Allow miners, millers, core drillers, and ore transporters to file a Special Exposure Cohort petition within the Energy Employees Occupational Illness Compensation Program Act (EEOICPA). Other DOE workers are currently allowed to file such petitions for compensation when claims are denied and there is not enough information for the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health to do dose reconstruction to determine the impacts of exposure.

To meet its responsibility to those Americans who sacrificed so much for our national security, Congress passed the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act (RECA) on October 5, 1990 and later broadened the scope of the Act's coverage on July 10, 2000. The current law offers compensation to individuals who contracted certain cancers and other serious diseases following their exposure to radiation released during above-ground atmospheric nuclear weapons tests or following their occupational exposure to radiation while employed in the uranium industry. However, there are many additional individuals who are sick or dying from radiation exposure and are unable to receive the compensation they deserve.

New Mexico: Lujan Delivers Address to New Mexico Legislature

LENGTH: 2168 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District addressed a joint session of the New Mexico Legislature this afternoon. Below are his remarks as prepared.

"To the distinguished members of the New Mexico House of Representatives, the New Mexico Senate, Governor Martinez, Speaker Tripp, President Pro-Tem Papen, tribal leaders, honored guests, family, and friends, thank you for welcoming me here today to discuss our shared commitment to the people of New Mexico and our common goal of building a brighter future for the New Mexico families we are so honored to represent.

"It is always a pleasure to be back in this distinguished chamber, a body that has such a special place in my heart and my family's as well. Thank you for allowing me this honor.

"Growing up and watching Dad serve in this body with my Mom always at his side, I have seen first-hand, how important it is to be the voice for those whose voices are often not heard. I saw the strength of our state and our legislature when New Mexico working families and growing the economy were at the top of everyone's priorities.

"From all around America to right here in the Roundhouse to every community across the Land of Enchantment, that should be our North Star - our mission as elected officials - fighting to grow our economy for each and every constituent we are fortunate to represent.

"As a state and a country, we cannot reach our full potential without a vibrant middle class. That means working day in and day out to ensure every New Mexican has a good-paying job, food on the table, an education for their children, living their golden years with dignity, and putting a little money in the bank at the end of the month.

"I am not naïve. I know that for too many New Mexicans, this vision feels like it's slipping away. I've sat across from many kitchen tables in many homes across New Mexico and looked into many parents' eyes and seen the hurt and fear as they struggle to provide the next meal for their children.

"Our vales demand more. I've talked to many New Mexicans who have spent too many days in search of too few jobs. We all know that New Mexicans deserve better.

"The national economy is gaining speed. The stock market is up, the private sector has added jobs for 59 straight months - the longest streak on record - but these gains are not being felt in homes across New Mexico.

"We must ask ourselves the tough questions and look within to find out why our neighboring states are growing, but New Mexico remains near the bottom. New Mexico leads the nation in child hunger and is near the bottom of childhood wellbeing. We cannot ignore these challenges. We cannot focus on small issues for political gain that sometimes distract us while the larger ones remain unaddressed.

"We cannot let our differences stand in the way of progress. Now is not the time for politics. Now is the time for helping New Mexico's families. As we begin a new Congress and work through our legislative session here at home, I hope that we can work in concert to address these challenges. I hope that we can work together on middle-class economics and offer struggling families a chance to build a brighter future here at home.

"The hard-working men and women of New Mexico are the backbone of our communities and our economy. We should be working to expand economic opportunities, create jobs and grow paychecks. To do this we must diversify our economy by taking advantage of New Mexico's unique resources.

"The federal labs are one of these resources that set us apart from states all across America. Three world-class labs in New Mexico create tremendous possibilities, but we must do more to leverage the labs to drive economic growth and job creation.

"Too many dollars that are coming to New Mexico are simply passing through and not staying here at home. An essential part of that effort is improving coordination between all the stakeholders who have an important role to play. We need a holistic approach with labs, local businesses, investors, the education community, and more all working together toward a common goal that is putting New Mexico first.

"Understanding the needs of the labs and the skills they value will help educators tailor a curriculum and job training toward those needs. Working with local businesses there can be internship and fellowship programs that provide valuable experience to prepare New Mexico's workforce. With the right focus we can attract and educate workers with the skills that then entice more businesses to set up shop in our communities - building an ecosystem around the labs that establishes a workforce pipeline and broader pool of capabilities to draw on.

"We need coordination that ensures that these efforts work in concert with our tax structure to incentivize growth in key areas. On this point I want to commend all the members of the New Mexico Legislature, the Governor, and the Jobs Council for their support of tax credits for Angel investors and research and development. That is good for New Mexico and it will put people to work. These are tools that can support startups and innovative businesses here in New Mexico that jumpstart our economy.

"At the federal level, I have been advocating for increased funding for the Small Business Innovation Research program and the Small Business Technology Transfer program. These programs encourage small businesses to engage in research and development, expanding public/private partnerships to include joint venture opportunities for small business and nonprofit research institutions, enabling them to collaborate with federal research institutions in an effort to bring technological innovations to the marketplace.

"I am also working with the Department of Energy and the National Nuclear Security Administration to encourage them to implement programs that bring together DOE and the Department of Commerce to engage businesses, venture equity, angel investors, universities, and regional entrepreneurs to develop capabilities the labs and the region need.

"As we look to the future of the labs and the impact they have on New Mexico, I believe that we should seek a greater role in shaping that future. The Sandia Management and Operation Contract is in the process of being solicited and re-bid and Los Alamos National Lab's contract will be here before we know it.

"We as a state should set a goal of having a New Mexico-led consortium as prime contractor for one or both of our national labs. If not in this next round, then certainly in the next. It will change the way those dollars flow through New Mexico, having New Mexico at the front of what will be happening day in and day out.

"I encourage the legislature to consider a joint memorial to bring together legislative leaders, the Governor, universities, and the business community to study how we make this happen so that New Mexico can take a leadership role in the operations of New Mexico's national labs.

"In addition to our labs, New Mexico is home to a wealth of natural resources. Wind and solar hold the potential to power our economy. Building a clean energy economy that turns these resources into jobs will be vital for the future of New Mexico.

"This Congress I will introduce legislation to promote increased investments in clean energy through a renewable energy standard that reduces carbon emissions and drives clean energy deployment in states around the country. By increasing the amount of renewable energy that our neighbors use, we can create more demand to export New Mexico's wind and solar. This means making transmission a key focus and encouraging more projects like SunZia throughout New Mexico so that we can move our clean energy into new markets. We can create these opportunities and protect New Mexico's assets, and we must commit to both.

"As New Mexicans, we are blessed by our surroundings with majestic lands that are some of the most beautiful in the world. We are home to the best hunting, fishing, and hiking. This is not only a great source for recreation; it is a major economic driver creating jobs in communities across the state.

"New Mexico's farmers grow crops that are a vital part of our economy as well as our culture, from pistachios to chile. It's these lands that truly make us the Land of Enchantment and it is why we must work to preserve them and support the farmers whose value-added products are the best in the world.

"While our lands, our crops, and our Carne Seca and chile are important, the most important and most treasured resource is every man, woman, and child who calls New Mexico home, who are determined, who are resilient. With the contributions from the Hispanic, Native American, Anglo, African American, and immigrant communities, to our soldiers, veterans, and military families who make us proud, our great diversity is a strength and we must embrace and celebrate it every day.

"With deep roots and a love for our land that has been home to so many generations of New Mexicans, our people are what make our state so strong. But we must invest in our greatest resources, our people. We must educate our children from their earliest days and get them on the right path from the very beginning. I will continue to support efforts at the federal level to expand access to Head Start and other early education programs that help children during their formative years, and I encourage you to take action here in New Mexico.

"With our children ranking near the top of every bad list, we must do something to break this cycle. The Land Grant Permanent Fund was created to invest in New Mexico, to help create wealth, to pave the way for positive education. What better place than in our children's future to invest?

"The challenges we face run deep. But that can't be an excuse for inaction. In fact it calls for bold action. Universal access to education is a must.

"Affordable higher education and access to job training programs must also be part of the equation. Too many students are drowning in debt, not being able to get into their first home, and sometimes not even being able to buy their first car. This is a challenge we can attack together.

"As we grow our economic sectors, we need skilled workers who are prepared for the jobs of the future. In his state of the Union Speech, President Obama called for more access to community college. I agree with the President that our community colleges can lead the way in an effort to provide a good education to all those who want to work hard.

"This Congress I will be introducing legislation to leverage our community colleges and to help them strengthen their clean energy curriculum so they can prepare students and retrain workers for careers in clean energy. By providing grants to community colleges to expand programs that focus on workforce development in this growing field, we can give students the tools they need to get ahead.

"Investing in the people of New Mexico so that we grow the middle class and combat the cycle of poverty is the key to a brighter future. What we should not do is weaken workers' ability to advocate for good wages and safe working conditions.

"As many of you know, we lost my Father to lung cancer over two years ago. Dad was an iron worker who worked up at Los Alamos and the conditions he worked in contributed to his diagnosis.

"Worker safety, ensuring that there are protections so that workers come home safe and sound every night to their family and are not impacted decades later, is of critical importance. And it is a top priority for the unions that fight for working men and women.

"Whether its workplace safety or fair wages, a 40-hour week or overtime pay, unions fought for many protections we now take for granted. That is why undermining our workers through policies that undermine working families would do more harm than good and will take New Mexico in the wrong direction.

"I am hopeful that instead we work together on areas that will strengthen working families, rebuild our economy, and create more opportunities for the people of New Mexico.

"New Mexico is at a crossroads. We have struggled through the deepest recession in a generation. The signs of an economic recovery are all around us, yet seem to be passing us by. The choices we make today will determine if we continue along this road or if we chart a new course that puts us back on the path to prosperity.

"My Father, Speaker Luján said: 'We should never give up. We must preserve in our pursuit to do good, make a difference, and treat every man, woman, and child with respect and dignity.'

"To each and every one of you, I wish you well. I wish you courage and wisdom. May God bless each and every one of you and keep you safe. May God bless New Mexico and may God bless America.

New Mexico: Lujan Introduces RECA Legislation to Expand Compensation for Those Exposed to Radiation

LENGTH: 869 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District introduced legislation in the House of Representatives today that expands compensation for those exposed to radiation while working in uranium mines or living downwind from atomic weapons tests. Companion legislation has been introduced in the Senate by a bipartisan coalition of Senators, including New Mexico Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich.

Among the provisions in the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act (RECA) Amendments of 2015 are much needed changes that would build upon previous RECA legislation by further widening qualifications for compensation for radiation exposure; qualifying post 1971 uranium workers for compensation; and expanding the downwind exposure area to include Colorado, Idaho, Montana, and New Mexico, as well as any county in Arizona, Nevada, or Utah, which has been shown to be impacted by downwind contamination.

"Until this gets done - compensating and recognizing the miners, workers, downwinders and all who are suffering from the impacts of uranium mining and nuclear testing during the Cold War - we will continue to push this legislation forward," Congressman Luján said. "I will continue my efforts to educate my colleagues in the House on the critical need to compensate all those who played a key role in our national security during the Cold War and have suffered as a result of their efforts."

Specifically, the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act Amendments of 2015 will:

o Extend compensation to employees of mines and mills employed after Dec. 31, 1971. These are individuals who began working in uranium mines and mills after the U.S. stopped purchasing uranium, but failed to implement and enforce adequate uranium mining safety standards. Many of these workers have the same illnesses as pre-1971 workers who currently qualify for RECA compensation.

o Add core drillers to the list of compensable employees, which currently only includes miners, millers and ore transporters.

o Add renal cancer, or any other chronic renal disease, to the list of compensable diseases for employees of mines and mills. Currently, millers and transporters are covered for kidney disease, but miners are not.

o Allow claimants to combine work histories to meet the requirement of the legislation. For example, individuals who worked half a year in a mill and half a year in a mine would be eligible for compensation. Currently, the Department of Justice makes some exceptions for this, but the policy is not codified in law.

o Make all claimants available for an equal amount of compensation, specifically $150,000, regardless of whether they are millers, miners, ore transporters, onsite employees, or downwinders.

o Make all claimants eligible for medical benefits. Currently, only miners, millers and ore transporters can claim medical benefits through the medical expense compensation program.

o Recognize radiation exposure from the Trinity Test Site in New Mexico, as well as tests in the Pacific Ocean.

o Expand the downwind areas to include all of Arizona, Nevada, New Mexico, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, and Utah for the Nevada Test Site; New Mexico for the Trinity Test Site; and Guam for the Pacific tests.

o Allow the use of affidavits to substantiate employment history, presence in affected area, and work at a test site. Current legislation only allows miners to use affidavits.

o Return all attorney fees to a cap of 10 percent of the amount of the RECA claim, as was mandated in the original 1990 RECA legislation.

o Authorize $3 million for five years for epidemiological research on the impacts of uranium development on communities and families of uranium workers. The funds would be allocated to the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences to award grants to universities and non-profits to carry out the research.

o Allow miners, millers, core drillers, and ore transporters to file a Special Exposure Cohort petition within the Energy Employees Occupational Illness Compensation Program Act (EEOICPA). Other DOE workers are currently allowed to file such petitions for compensation when claims are denied and there is not enough information for the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health to do dose reconstruction to determine the impacts of exposure.

To meet its responsibility to those Americans who sacrificed so much for our national security, Congress passed the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act (RECA) on October 5, 1990 and later broadened the scope of the Act's coverage on July 10, 2000. The current law offers compensation to individuals who contracted certain cancers and other serious diseases following their exposure to radiation released during above-ground atmospheric nuclear weapons tests or following their occupational exposure to radiation while employed in the uranium industry. However, there are many additional individuals who are sick or dying from radiation exposure and are unable to receive the compensation they deserve.

EDITORIAL: Addressing poverty needs to grab legislative focus

BYLINE: The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: COMMENTARY

LENGTH: 652 words

Feb. 22--Occasionally, an outside perspective is necessary -- and that includes the workings of the New Mexico Legislature. Last week, several of New Mexico's congressional representatives gave their traditional speeches during the session, imparting wisdom that legislators should take to heart.

U.S. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, in particular, needs to be heard, as she powerfully distilled the state's many challenges into one: poverty.

"It's time that you declare war on poverty in New Mexico. It is time that the New Mexico Legislature flat-out declare war," Lujan Grisham said, reminding everyone that poverty is the underlying issue with every problem in the state. "There's not a single member here, from the House or the Senate, Republican or Democrat, who doesn't have poverty issues that you're working to address in the neighborhoods that you represent. There's not a single elected leader here today who doesn't have a hungry child or a school with a nutrition program that's in trouble."

When she made this challenge to the Legislature, Lujan Grisham earned a standing ovation. (It's the kind of speech she could be making around the state in a few years, should she transfer her political interests from Washington, D.C., to the state level. A second Latina governor, perhaps?)

What makes this speech important -- because after all, words are just words -- is that it gives us a lens through which to see the current legislative session and all its machinations.

Imagine if legislators asked of every bill, every time, "Will this create a job?" "Will this help put food on the table?" "Will this make families more secure?" So much clutter of the session could be removed, to focus on improving the state from the ground up.

U.S. Rep. Steve Pearce, the lone Republican in the congressional delegation, encouraged lawmakers to focus on jobs. With gas and oil prices falling, he told legislators that New Mexico should boost technology and agriculture, and perhaps revive the timber industry. "What people want is not complex at all. They just want financial security and independence," Pearce said. That's certainly sentiment both parties can endorse.

Similarly, U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, Santa Fe's congressman, had this to say: "As a state and a country, we cannot reach our full potential without a vibrant middle class.

"I am not naïve. I know that for too many New Mexicans, this vision feels like it's slipping away. I've sat across from many kitchen tables in many homes across New Mexico and looked into many parents' eyes and seen the hurt and fear as they struggle to provide the next meal for their children."

He connected the recovering national economy to what's happening on the ground here in New Mexico. "I've talked to many New Mexicans who have spent too many days in search of too few jobs. We all know that New Mexicans deserve better," Luján said. "The national economy is gaining speed. The stock market is up, the private sector has added jobs for 59 straight months -- the longest streak on record -- but these gains are not being felt in homes across New Mexico."

When U.S. Sen. Tom Udall wrapped up on Friday (Sen. Martin Heinrich still hasn't spoken), the chorus of voices for improving the economy was complete. "Thirty percent of New Mexico children and 44 percent of Native American children live below the poverty line." Udall said. "We should work together to improve that. No American who works full time should be in poverty."

It's difficult to see how a fight over driver's licenses for undocumented immigrants will feed one child or provide one more job. Rather than re-fight old battles, the Legislature should focus on jobs, fighting poverty and increasing economic opportunity. This session, not later.

Udall speaks against right-to-work, urges more funds for early ed

BYLINE: Patrick Malone, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 431 words

Feb. 21--U.S. Sen. Tom Udall used his pulpit during a joint session of the New Mexico Legislature on Friday to weigh in on two of the most divisive issues facing state lawmakers this session.

He spoke out against so-called "right-to-work" legislation and expressed support for a measure that would let voters decide whether to tap into the state's savings to expand early childhood education.

Pointing out the state's poor rankings on child well-being, Udall, a Democrat, announced his support for Senate Joint Resolution 5. The measure would ask voters whether to devote a larger part of the state's multibillion-dollar Land Grant Permanent Fund to early childhood programs.

"I support the constitutional amendment to dedicate a portion of the permanent fund to improving child well-being," Udall said. "Let's take it to the voters. Let them decide."

Some conservative Democrats have joined Republicans in the Legislature to defeat similar proposals in recent years. They have objected to depleting the state's savings.

Udall also blasted House Republican-sponsored legislation that aims to prohibit union membership as a condition of employment, commonly known as right-to-work.

"I urge you to resist wasting time on quick fixes that sound good, but that hold back hardworking New Mexico families," Udall said. "Right-to-work laws won't make child care more available for working moms in Guadalupe; they won't build a strong high-tech workforce in Albuquerque or ensure farmers in Luna County can find a market for their chiles and wine."

Pat Garrett, spokesman for the House Republicans, fired back at Udall's criticisms of the right-to-work proposals.

"It's no surprise that a poster child of Washington dysfunction would proudly preach gridlock and call a common-sense compromise a waste of time," Garrett said.

Udall's speech concluded a week filled with joint sessions of the Legislature featuring addresses from New Mexico's congressional delegation. Already, lawmakers had heard from U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce, a Republican, and Michelle Lujan Grisham and Ben Ray Luján, both Democrats.

Udall said partisan bickering only stands to derail the Legislature's efforts to turn around the state's economy.

"New Mexico does not have the luxury of gridlock. Trust me. You do not want to go down that road," he said. "I've seen it in Washington. The gridlock road is a bumpy road. It's not a fun road. Don't go down that road."

Rep. Luján suggests NM consortium to operate labs; Local management could bring benefits

BYLINE: KEVIN ROBINSON-AVILA JOURNAL STAFF WRITER

SECTION: BUSINESS; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 496 words

SANTA FE - Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., called on New Mexico's political leaders on Thursday to consider forming a public-private consortium to bid on future federal contracts to run one or both of the state's two national labs.

Luján, who addressed a joint session of the Legislature, said a local management team for Sandia National Laboratories or Los Alamos National Laboratory might work harder to hold on to more of the federal dollars that flow into the labs.

"We need to do more to leverage the labs to drive economic growth and job creation," Luján told state legislators. "Too many dollars are simply passing through the labs and not staying here."

Luján said with New Mexico contractors at the helm, more opportunities might become available for local businesses.

In particular, Luján said he is pushing federal agencies to more aggressively engage entrepreneurs and investors in public-private partnerships to transfer promising technologies out of the labs and into the marketplace.

Lockheed Martin Corp., and a partnership between Bechtel and the University of California currently manage Sandia and Los Alamos, respectively, under contracts with the National Nuclear Security Administration. But those contracts could be put out to bid in the next few years.

Lockheed's contract at Sandia runs through April 2016, with a one-year extension option. The Bechtel-UC partnership is contracted through 2017, with one-year extension options to 2023, depending on annual performance reviews.

"We as a state should set a goal of having a New Mexico-led consortium as prime contractor for one or both of our national labs," Luján said. "It will change the way those dollars flow through New Mexico, having New Mexico at the front of what will be happening day in and day out."

The congressman called on New Mexico's representatives and senators to approve a joint memorial to bring public officials, universities and the business community together to study how New Mexico can take a leadership role at the labs.

Luján said such initiatives are critical to spur economic growth in New Mexico, which is lagging behind other states in recovering from the recession.

"The rest of the nation is bypassing us," the congressman said. "We need to chart a new course that puts us back on the road to prosperity."

Luján urged legislators to put aside political differences and work cooperatively to provide more opportunities to New Mexicans. He said good-paying jobs can come from promoting more renewable energy development, and by protecting the state's natural resources, which provide tourism and agricultural employment opportunities. He also called for greater investment in education, even if that means digging further into the Land Grant Permanent Fund.

Luján, who represents the 3rd Congressional District in northern New Mexico, is the third U.S. representative to address the Legislature this week. Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., and Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., also appeared.

Rep. calls for war on New Mexico poverty; Lujan Grisham praises state lawmakers for creation of Jobs Council

BYLINE: DAN BOYD JOURNAL CAPITOL BUREAU

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A3

LENGTH: 306 words

SANTA FE - U.S. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham called on state lawmakers to target their efforts at the state's economy and elevated poverty rate Wednesday, saying, "It's time you declare a war on poverty in New Mexico."

Lujan Grisham, a Democrat who was re-elected in November 2014 to a second term in Congress, also said legislators should not look to Washington, D.C., for a model on bipartisanship.

"We are not working collectively enough on the type of bipartisan compromises that would work to jump-start New Mexico's economy," she said, while vowing to try to work more with Republicans on Capitol Hill on poverty-related issues.

Her "war on poverty" remarks echoed a phrase used by former President Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964 as part of his push for federal programs aimed at lowering poverty rates.

As of 2013, New Mexico had the nation's second-highest percentage of people living in poverty, according to U.S. Census Bureau numbers released last fall. Roughly 21.9 percent of New Mexicans lived in poverty in that year, an increase of about 22,000 people from 2012.

Meanwhile, Lujan Grisham also lauded state lawmakers for creating a Jobs Council, a bipartisan group that has studied the state's economy and recommended ways to bolster job creation efforts.

A former state Cabinet secretary who represents the Albuquerque-based 1st Congressional District, Lujan Grisham also touched on access to behavioral health services and public safety issues in her 30-minute speech.

"We should not be militarizing our police forces," Lujan Grisham said. "That's not the purpose of those civil servants."

Lujan Grisham was the second member of the state's congressional delegation to deliver an address to lawmakers, as U.S. Rep. Steve Pearce, a Republican, spoke Tuesday. U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-NM, is scheduled to address the Legislature today.

LUJAN DELIVERS ADDRESS TO NEW MEXICO LEGISLATURE; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 2145 words

Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District addressed a joint session of the New Mexico Legislature this afternoon. Below are his remarks as prepared.

"To the distinguished members of the New Mexico House of Representatives, the New Mexico Senate, Governor Martinez, Speaker Tripp, President Pro-Tem Papen, tribal leaders, honored guests, family, and friends, thank you for welcoming me here today to discuss our shared commitment to the people of New Mexico and our common goal of building a brighter future for the New Mexico families we are so honored to represent.

"It is always a pleasure to be back in this distinguished chamber, a body that has such a special place in my heart and my family's as well. Thank you for allowing me this honor.

"Growing up and watching Dad serve in this body with my Mom always at his side, I have seen first-hand, how important it is to be the voice for those whose voices are often not heard. I saw the strength of our state and our legislature when New Mexico working families and growing the economy were at the top of everyone's priorities.

"From all around America to right here in the Roundhouse to every community across the Land of Enchantment, that should be our North Star - our mission as elected officials - fighting to grow our economy for each and every constituent we are fortunate to represent.

"As a state and a country, we cannot reach our full potential without a vibrant middle class.

That means working day in and day out to ensure every New Mexican has a good-paying job, food on the table, an education for their children, living their golden years with dignity, and putting a little money in the bank at the end of the month.

"I am not naive. I know that for too many New Mexicans, this vision feels like it's slipping away. I've sat across from many kitchen tables in many homes across New Mexico and looked into many parents' eyes and seen the hurt and fear as they struggle to provide the next meal for their children.

"Our vales demand more. I've talked to many New Mexicans who have spent too many days in search of too few jobs. We all know that New Mexicans deserve better.

"The national economy is gaining speed. The stock market is up, the private sector has added jobs for 59 straight months - the longest streak on record - but these gains are not being felt in homes across New Mexico.

"We must ask ourselves the tough questions and look within to find out why our neighboring states are growing, but New Mexico remains near the bottom. New Mexico leads the nation in child hunger and is near the bottom of childhood wellbeing. We cannot ignore these challenges. We cannot focus on small issues for political gain that sometimes distract us while the larger ones remain unaddressed.

"We cannot let our differences stand in the way of progress. Now is not the time for politics. Now is the time for helping New Mexico's families. As we begin a new Congress and work through our legislative session here at home, I hope that we can work in concert to address these challenges. I hope that we can work together on middle-class economics and offer struggling families a chance to build a brighter future here at home.

"The hard-working men and women of New Mexico are the backbone of our communities and our economy. We should be working to expand economic opportunities, create jobs and grow paychecks. To do this we must diversify our economy by taking advantage of New Mexico's unique resources.

"The federal labs are one of these resources that set us apart from states all across America. Three world-class labs in New Mexico create tremendous possibilities, but we must do more to leverage the labs to drive economic growth and job creation.

"Too many dollars that are coming to New Mexico are simply passing through and not staying here at home. An essential part of that effort is improving coordination between all the stakeholders who have an important role to play. We need a holistic approach with labs, local businesses, investors, the education community, and more all working together toward a common goal that is putting New Mexico first.

"Understanding the needs of the labs and the skills they value will help educators tailor a curriculum and job training toward those needs. Working with local businesses there can be internship and fellowship programs that provide valuable experience to prepare New Mexico's workforce. With the right focus we can attract and educate workers with the skills that then entice more businesses to set up shop in our communities - building an ecosystem around the labs that establishes a workforce pipeline and broader pool of capabilities to draw on.

"We need coordination that ensures that these efforts work in concert with our tax structure to incentivize growth in key areas. On this point I want to commend all the members of the New Mexico Legislature, the Governor, and the Jobs Council for their support of tax credits for Angel investors and research and development. That is good for New Mexico and it will put people to work. These are tools that can support startups and innovative businesses here in New Mexico that jumpstart our economy.

"At the federal level, I have been advocating for increased funding for the Small Business Innovation Research program and the Small Business Technology Transfer program. These programs encourage small businesses to engage in research and development, expanding public/private partnerships to include joint venture opportunities for small business and nonprofit research institutions, enabling them to collaborate with federal research institutions in an effort to bring technological innovations to the marketplace.

"I am also working with the Department of Energy and the National Nuclear Security Administration to encourage them to implement programs that bring together DOE and the Department of Commerce to engage businesses, venture equity, angel investors, universities, and regional entrepreneurs to develop capabilities the labs and the region need.

"As we look to the future of the labs and the impact they have on New Mexico, I believe that we should seek a greater role in shaping that future. The Sandia Management and Operation Contract is in the process of being solicited and re-bid and Los Alamos National Lab's contract will be here before we know it.

"We as a state should set a goal of having a New Mexico-led consortium as prime contractor for one or both of our national labs. If not in this next round, then certainly in the next. It will change the way those dollars flow through New Mexico, having New Mexico at the front of what will be happening day in and day out.

"I encourage the legislature to consider a joint memorial to bring together legislative leaders, the Governor, universities, and the business community to study how we make this happen so that New Mexico can take a leadership role in the operations of New Mexico's national labs.

"In addition to our labs, New Mexico is home to a wealth of natural resources. Wind and solar hold the potential to power our economy. Building a clean energy economy that turns these resources into jobs will be vital for the future of New Mexico.

"This Congress I will introduce legislation to promote increased investments in clean energy through a renewable energy standard that reduces carbon emissions and drives clean energy deployment in states around the country. By increasing the amount of renewable energy that our neighbors use, we can create more demand to export New Mexico's wind and solar. This means making transmission a key focus and encouraging more projects like SunZia throughout New Mexico so that we can move our clean energy into new markets. We can create these opportunities and protect New Mexico's assets, and we must commit to both.

"As New Mexicans, we are blessed by our surroundings with majestic lands that are some of the most beautiful in the world. We are home to the best hunting, fishing, and hiking. This is not only a great source for recreation; it is a major economic driver creating jobs in communities across the state.

"New Mexico's farmers grow crops that are a vital part of our economy as well as our culture, from pistachios to chile. It's these lands that truly make us the Land of Enchantment and it is why we must work to preserve them and support the farmers whose value-added products are the best in the world.

"While our lands, our crops, and our Carne Seca and chile are important, the most important and most treasured resource is every man, woman, and child who calls New Mexico home, who are determined, who are resilient. With the contributions from the Hispanic, Native American, Anglo, African American, and immigrant communities, to our soldiers, veterans, and military families who make us proud, our great diversity is a strength and we must embrace and celebrate it every day.

"With deep roots and a love for our land that has been home to so many generations of New Mexicans, our people are what make our state so strong. But we must invest in our greatest resources, our people. We must educate our children from their earliest days and get them on the right path from the very beginning. I will continue to support efforts at the federal level to expand access to Head Start and other early education programs that help children during their formative years, and I encourage you to take action here in New Mexico.

"With our children ranking near the top of every bad list, we must do something to break this cycle. The Land Grant Permanent Fund was created to invest in New Mexico, to help create wealth, to pave the way for positive education. What better place than in our children's future to invest?

"The challenges we face run deep. But that can't be an excuse for inaction. In fact it calls for bold action. Universal access to education is a must.

"Affordable higher education and access to job training programs must also be part of the equation. Too many students are drowning in debt, not being able to get into their first home, and sometimes not even being able to buy their first car. This is a challenge we can attack together.

"As we grow our economic sectors, we need skilled workers who are prepared for the jobs of the future. In his state of the Union Speech, President Obama called for more access to community college. I agree with the President that our community colleges can lead the way in an effort to provide a good education to all those who want to work hard.

"This Congress I will be introducing legislation to leverage our community colleges and to help them strengthen their clean energy curriculum so they can prepare students and retrain workers for careers in clean energy. By providing grants to community colleges to expand programs that focus on workforce development in this growing field, we can give students the tools they need to get ahead.

"Investing in the people of New Mexico so that we grow the middle class and combat the cycle of poverty is the key to a brighter future. What we should not do is weaken workers' ability to advocate for good wages and safe working conditions.

"As many of you know, we lost my Father to lung cancer over two years ago. Dad was an iron worker who worked up at Los Alamos and the conditions he worked in contributed to his diagnosis.

"Worker safety, ensuring that there are protections so that workers come home safe and sound every night to their family and are not impacted decades later, is of critical importance. And it is a top priority for the unions that fight for working men and women.

"Whether its workplace safety or fair wages, a 40-hour week or overtime pay, unions fought for many protections we now take for granted. That is why undermining our workers through policies that undermine working families would do more harm than good and will take New Mexico in the wrong direction.

"I am hopeful that instead we work together on areas that will strengthen working families, rebuild our economy, and create more opportunities for the people of New Mexico.

"New Mexico is at a crossroads. We have struggled through the deepest recession in a generation. The signs of an economic recovery are all around us, yet seem to be passing us by. The choices we make today will determine if we continue along this road or if we chart a new course that puts us back on the path to prosperity.

"My Father, Speaker Lujan said: 'We should never give up. We must preserve in our pursuit to do good, make a difference, and treat every man, woman, and child with respect and dignity.'

"To each and every one of you, I wish you well. I wish you courage and wisdom. May God bless each and every one of you and keep you safe. May God bless New Mexico and may God bless America.

HOUSE: GOP campaign arm targets 2 top Democrats in '16 cycle

SECTION: Politics Vol. 10 No. 9

LENGTH: 326 words

Daniel Bush, E&E reporter

The House GOP's campaign arm will target two top Democrats and several vulnerable freshman lawmakers in 2016, party officials announced today. The National Republican Congressional Committee has its sights set on defeating Reps. Ben Ray Luján (N.M.) and Steve Israel (N.Y.), who are leading their party's efforts to bounce back from last year's election, when the GOP picked up 13 seats and expanded its House majority to its largest size since the 1920s. Luján replaced Israel last month as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Israel is heading a new policy and communications shop tasked with revamping the House Democratic Caucus' campaign message. Neither one is likely to lose, but by going after leading Democrats, the NRCC is sending a message that it plans to be on the offensive during a tough presidential election year. In addition toLuján and Israel, the GOP has also singled out 17 other Democrats from New York to California who were elected recently or who represent swing districts. The list includes the five Democrats left in the House who represent right-leaning districts that President Obama lost to Mitt Romney in the 2012 presidential election (E&E Daily, Feb. 10). "As [House Minority Leader] Nancy Pelosi continues to pull her smaller and weaker caucus of House Democrats to the far left, we are going to make sure that these vulnerable Democrats are held responsible for their disastrous policies," NRCC spokeswoman Katie Martin said in a statement. The NRCC's full list: Reps. Ann Kirkpatrick and Kyrsten Sinema of Arizona; John Garamendi, Ami Bera, Julia Brownley, Pete Aguilar, Raul Ruiz and Scott Peters of California; Elizabeth Esty of Connecticut; Gwen Graham and Patrick Murphy of Florida; Cheri Bustos of Illinois; Collin Peterson and Rick Nolan of Minnesota; Brad Ashford of Nebraska; Annie Kuster of New Hampshire; Sean Patrick Maloney of New York; and Luján and Israel.

Fleischmann and Luján to Lead House Nuclear Cleanup Caucus

LENGTH: 529 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Chuck Fleischmann, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Chairman Chuck Fleischmann (R-TN) and Co-Chairman Ben Ray Luján (D-NM) announced today they will serve as co-chairs of the House Nuclear Cleanup Caucus, which held its first meeting of the 114th Congress to discuss the importance of raising awareness of environmental management issues in Congress. Fifty years of government nuclear weapons development stemming from the Manhattan Project during World War II has affected communities across the nation and resulted in the need for environmental cleanup at numerous sites.

"Our nation has a tremendous nuclear history, and with that has come an important nuclear cleanup mission," said Fleischmann who represents the city of Oak Ridge. "I am excited today to host the first meeting of the 114th Congress' Nuclear Cleanup Caucus with co-chair Lujan and members from across the country who have districts that are impacted. I also want to thank Acting Assistant Secretary for Environmental Management, Mark Whitney, for taking part in this meeting. This Caucus will serve to promote the awareness of our nuclear legacy and build a stronger coalition to fight for the needs of our cleanup missions, and I am eager to get to work."

"The Nuclear Security Complex has a number of legacies that are deeply rooted in its regional communities. First amongst these is the legacy of service by members of the local community in support of the national defense," said Luján whose New Mexico district includes Los Alamos National Laboratory. "However, there is also the legacy of nuclear waste, which continues to threaten the current and future health and environment of these communities that have given so much to our nation. Moving forward we need to honor the legacy of service by fulfilling our obligation to clean up this legacy of waste in a safe, effective, and efficient manner. I look forward to working with Rep. Fleischmann, the rest of the caucus, and stakeholders, including the Regional Coalition of LANL Communities, which I recently met with to discuss the importance of environmental cleanup and our commitment to advocating for the resources to address waste at LANL."

Today's meeting provided the first opportunity for members who represent cleanup sites and stakeholders to come together to discuss the importance of advocating for environmental cleanup and raising awareness with their colleagues in Congress. Members of the caucus were joined by Mark Whitney, Acting Assistant Secretary for Environmental Management at the Department of Energy.

The Department of Energy's Office of Environmental Management has completed cleanup of 91 of the 107 sites where nuclear waste was generated as part of the federal nuclear security and energy research, development and production complex. The 16 remaining sites are spread across 11 states and include a number of large and complex sites, such as Hanford and Savannah River sites and Oak Ridge, TN, Idaho, and Los Alamos National Laboratories.

Udall, Lujan, Lujan Grisham Lead Bipartisan Coalition to Protect States' Mineral Royalties

LENGTH: 413 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

U.S. Sen. Tom Udall and U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham introduced bipartisan legislation this week that would allow states to collect their own mineral royalties, protecting money that is rightfully owed to the states. The bill would effectively eliminate a collection fee charged by the federal government, which amounts to around $40 million per year.

The Mineral Leasing Act provides that the continental states be paid 50 percent of the revenues resulting from the leasing of mineral resources on federal public domain lands within their borders. These royalties are used by states to fund such necessary items as public school systems, community colleges, emergency response activities and basic infrastructure projects. But in recent years, the federal government began charging states a 2 percent fee to cover collection and disbursement costs. This legislation would ensure that states can continue to receive their 50 percent share of mineral royalties by giving them the option to administer their own programs.

"The federal government's unnecessary fee on mineral revenues takes money from state budgets -- money that many New Mexico communities depend to fund public schools, emergency response and other critical services," Udall said. "New Mexico earned these royalties from our abundant natural resources, and New Mexico communities deserve to keep their share of the revenues without federal interference."

"New Mexico's federal lands are a significant resource that provides important royalties that should be used to strengthen New Mexico," Luján said. "This legislation will ensure that more of the money that is rightfully owed to states will be returned in order to support vital programs and investments that make a difference in our communities. Sending the money directly to the states and not to the federal government first will streamline the process, reduce administrative costs, and allow states to receive more of these critical funds."

"This bipartisan bill will ensure New Mexico can keep its fair share of revenue and help the state invest in important priorities, including schools, infrastructure development, small businesses, and other public welfare and economic development programs," Lujan Grisham said.

Lujan Calls for a Vote on Clean DHS Funding Bill

LENGTH: 289 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District joined with House Democrats this morning to urge Republicans to stop playing politics with national security and allow a vote on a clean bill to fund the Department of Homeland Security (DHS). With funding set to expire at the end of the month, House Republicans have only scheduled four legislative days to address this critical issue.

"It is time for Congressional Republicans to stop putting their political security ahead of our national security and pass a clean bill rather than cater to the extreme anti-immigration wing of their party that is willing to sacrifice our nation's security in order to attack DREAMers," Congressman Luján said. "Already Congressional Republicans' failure to provide long-term funding has negatively impacted the Department of Homeland Security. Missing the next deadline would not only threaten our national security, it would also harm the many New Mexicans who work for the Department and would be left without a paycheck. Republicans should end these political games and put our national security first."

Earlier this week, Luján cosponsored a clean bill that avoids a shutdown of the agency charged with coordinating efforts to prevent and respond to acts of terrorism by funding DHS through the end of the fiscal year. This stands in stark contrast to House Republicans, who have refused to fund DHS unless the legislation also targets DREAMers, kids who were brought to this country through no fault of their own.

Lujan and Fleischmann to Lead House Nuclear Cleanup Caucus

LENGTH: 569 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

United States Representatives Ben Ray Luján (D-NM) and Chuck Fleischmann (R-TN) announced today they will serve as co-chairs of the House Nuclear Cleanup Caucus, which held its first meeting of the 114th Congress to discuss the importance of raising awareness of environmental management issues in Congress. Fifty years of government nuclear weapons development stemming from the Manhattan Project during World War II has affected communities across the nation and resulted in the need for environmental cleanup at numerous sites.

"The Nuclear Security Complex has a number of legacies that are deeply rooted in its regional communities. First amongst these is the legacy of service by members of the local community in support of the national defense," said Luján, whose New Mexico district includes Los Alamos National Laboratory. "However, there is also the legacy of nuclear waste, which continues to threaten the current and future health and environment of these communities that have given so much to our nation. Moving forward we need to honor the legacy of service by fulfilling our obligation to clean up this legacy of waste in a safe, effective, and efficient manner. I look forward to working with Rep. Fleischmann, the rest of the caucus, and stakeholders, including the Regional Coalition of LANL Communities, which I recently met with to discuss the importance of environmental cleanup and our commitment to advocating for the resources to address waste at LANL."

"Our nation has a tremendous nuclear history, and with that has come an important nuclear cleanup mission. I am excited today to host the first meeting of the 114th Congress' Nuclear Cleanup Caucus with co-chair Lujan and members from across the country who have districts that are impacted," said Fleischmann, who represents the city of Oak Ridge. "I also want to thank Acting Assistant Secretary for Environmental Management, Mark Whitney, for taking part in this meeting. This Caucus will serve to promote the awareness of our nuclear legacy and build a stronger coalition to fight for the needs of our cleanup missions, and I am eager to get to work."

Today's meeting provided the first opportunity for members who represent cleanup sites and stakeholders to come together to discuss the importance of advocating for environmental cleanup and raising awareness with their colleagues in Congress. Members of the caucus were joined by Mark Whitney, Acting Assistant Secretary for Environmental Management at the Department of Energy.

"The Environmental Management program benefits from the continued focus and support from the Members of the Cleanup Caucus as we continue to make progress on completing cleanup at sites and in communities across the nation," said Whitney.

The Department of Energy's Office of Environmental Management has completed cleanup of 91 of the 107 sites where nuclear waste was generated as part of the federal nuclear security and energy research, development and production complex. The 16 remaining sites are spread across 11 states and include a number of large and complex sites, such as Hanford and Savannah River sites and Oak Ridge, Idaho, and Los Alamos National Laboratories.

Lujan Introduces RECA Legislation to Expand Compensation for Those Exposed to Radiation

LENGTH: 872 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District introduced legislation in the House of Representatives today that expands compensation for those exposed to radiation while working in uranium mines or living downwind from atomic weapons tests. Companion legislation has been introduced in the Senate by a bipartisan coalition of Senators, including New Mexico Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich.

Among the provisions in the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act (RECA) Amendments of 2015 are much needed changes that would build upon previous RECA legislation by further widening qualifications for compensation for radiation exposure; qualifying post 1971 uranium workers for compensation; and expanding the downwind exposure area to include Colorado, Idaho, Montana, and New Mexico, as well as any county in Arizona, Nevada, or Utah, which has been shown to be impacted by downwind contamination.

"Until this gets done - compensating and recognizing the miners, workers, downwinders and all who are suffering from the impacts of uranium mining and nuclear testing during the Cold War - we will continue to push this legislation forward," Congressman Luján said. "I will continue my efforts to educate my colleagues in the House on the critical need to compensate all those who played a key role in our national security during the Cold War and have suffered as a result of their efforts."

Specifically, the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act Amendments of 2015 will:

o Extend compensation to employees of mines and mills employed after Dec. 31, 1971. These are individuals who began working in uranium mines and mills after the U.S. stopped purchasing uranium, but failed to implement and enforce adequate uranium mining safety standards. Many of these workers have the same illnesses as pre-1971 workers who currently qualify for RECA compensation.

o Add core drillers to the list of compensable employees, which currently only includes miners, millers and ore transporters.

o Add renal cancer, or any other chronic renal disease, to the list of compensable diseases for employees of mines and mills. Currently, millers and transporters are covered for kidney disease, but miners are not.

o Allow claimants to combine work histories to meet the requirement of the legislation. For example, individuals who worked half a year in a mill and half a year in a mine would be eligible for compensation. Currently, the Department of Justice makes some exceptions for this, but the policy is not codified in law.

o Make all claimants available for an equal amount of compensation, specifically $150,000, regardless of whether they are millers, miners, ore transporters, onsite employees, or downwinders.

o Make all claimants eligible for medical benefits. Currently, only miners, millers and ore transporters can claim medical benefits through the medical expense compensation program.

o Recognize radiation exposure from the Trinity Test Site in New Mexico, as well as tests in the Pacific Ocean.

o Expand the downwind areas to include all of Arizona, Nevada, New Mexico, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, and Utah for the Nevada Test Site; New Mexico for the Trinity Test Site; and Guam for the Pacific tests.

o Allow the use of affidavits to substantiate employment history, presence in affected area, and work at a test site. Current legislation only allows miners to use affidavits.

o Return all attorney fees to a cap of 10 percent of the amount of the RECA claim, as was mandated in the original 1990 RECA legislation.

o Authorize $3 million for five years for epidemiological research on the impacts of uranium development on communities and families of uranium workers. The funds would be allocated to the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences to award grants to universities and non-profits to carry out the research.

o Allow miners, millers, core drillers, and ore transporters to file a Special Exposure Cohort petition within the Energy Employees Occupational Illness Compensation Program Act (EEOICPA). Other DOE workers are currently allowed to file such petitions for compensation when claims are denied and there is not enough information for the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health to do dose reconstruction to determine the impacts of exposure.

To meet its responsibility to those Americans who sacrificed so much for our national security, Congress passed the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act (RECA) on October 5, 1990 and later broadened the scope of the Act's coverage on July 10, 2000. The current law offers compensation to individuals who contracted certain cancers and other serious diseases following their exposure to radiation released during above-ground atmospheric nuclear weapons tests or following their occupational exposure to radiation while employed in the uranium industry. However, there are many additional individuals who are sick or dying from radiation exposure and are unable to receive the compensation they deserve.

* Make all claimants eligible for medical benefits. Currently, only miners, millers and ore transporters can claim medical benefits through the medical expense compensation program.

* Recognize radiation exposure from the Trinity Test Site in New Mexico, as well as tests in the Pacific Ocean.

* Expand the downwind areas to include all of Arizona, Nevada, New Mexico, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, and Utah for the Nevada Test Site; New Mexico for the Trinity Test Site; and Guam for the Pacific tests.

* Allow the use of affidavits to substantiate employment history, presence in affected area, and work at a test site. Current legislation only allows miners to use affidavits.

* Return all attorney fees to a cap of 10 percent of the amount of the RECA claim, as was mandated in the original 1990 RECA legislation.

* Authorize $3 million for five years for epidemiological research on the impacts of uranium development on communities and families of uranium workers. The funds would be allocated to the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences to award grants to universities and non-profits to carry out the research.

* Allow miners, millers, core drillers, and ore transporters to file a Special Exposure Cohort petition within the Energy Employees Occupational Illness Compensation Program Act (EEOICPA). Other DOE workers are currently allowed to file such petitions for compensation when claims are denied and there is not enough information for the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health to do dose reconstruction to determine the impacts of exposure.

To meet its responsibility to those Americans who sacrificed so much for our national security, Congress passed the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act (RECA) on October 5, 1990 and later broadened the scope of the Act's coverage on July 10, 2000. The current law offers compensation to individuals who contracted certain cancers and other serious diseases following their exposure to radiation released during above-ground atmospheric nuclear weapons tests or following their occupational exposure to radiation while employed in the uranium industry. However, there are many additional individuals who are sick or dying from radiation exposure and are unable to receive the compensation they deserve.

UDALL, LUJAN, LUJAN GRISHAM LEAD BIPARTISAN COALITION TO PROTECT STATES' MINERAL ROYALTIES; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 425 words

WASHINGTON - U.S. Sen. Tom Udall and U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham introduced bipartisan legislation this week that would allow states to collect their own mineral royalties, protecting money that is rightfully owed to the states. The bill would effectively eliminate a collection fee charged by the federal government, which amounts to around $40 million per year.

The Mineral Leasing Act provides that the continental states be paid 50 percent of the revenues resulting from the leasing of mineral resources on federal public domain lands within their borders. These royalties are used by states to fund such necessary items as public school systems, community colleges, emergency response activities and basic infrastructure projects. But in recent years, the federal government began charging states a 2 percent fee to cover collection and disbursement costs. This legislation would ensure that states can continue to receive their 50 percent share of mineral royalties by giving them the option to administer their own programs.

"The federal government's unnecessary fee on mineral revenues takes money from state budgets -- money that many New Mexico communities depend to fund public schools, emergency response and other critical services," Udall said. "New Mexico earned these royalties from our abundant natural resources, and New Mexico communities deserve to keep their share of the revenues without federal interference."

"New Mexico's federal lands are a significant resource that provides important royalties that should be used to strengthen New Mexico," Lujan said. "This legislation will ensure that more of the money that is rightfully owed to states will be returned in order to support vital programs and investments that make a difference in our communities. Sending the money directly to the states and not to the federal government first will streamline the process, reduce administrative costs, and allow states to receive more of these critical funds."

"This bipartisan bill will ensure New Mexico can keep its fair share of revenue and help the state invest in important priorities, including schools, infrastructure development, small businesses, and other public welfare and economic development programs," Lujan Grisham said.

U.S. Sens. John Barrasso, R-Wyo., Mike Enzi, R-Wyo. and U.S. Rep. Cynthia Lummis, R-Wyo., joined to introduce the bill.

LUJAN CALLS FOR A VOTE ON CLEAN DHS FUNDING BILL; Joins House Democrats to Urge Republicans to Stop Playing Politics with National Security; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM). News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 274 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District joined with House Democrats this morning to urge Republicans to stop playing politics with national security and allow a vote on a clean bill to fund the Department of Homeland Security (DHS). With funding set to expire at the end of the month, House Republicans have only scheduled four legislative days to address this critical issue.

"It is time for Congressional Republicans to stop putting their political security ahead of our national security and pass a clean bill rather than cater to the extreme anti-immigration wing of their party that is willing to sacrifice our nation's security in order to attack DREAMers," Congressman Lujan said. "Already Congressional Republicans' failure to provide long-term funding has negatively impacted the Department of Homeland Security. Missing the next deadline would not only threaten our national security, it would also harm the many New Mexicans who work for the Department and would be left without a paycheck. Republicans should end these political games and put our national security first."

Earlier this week, Lujan cosponsored a clean bill that avoids a shutdown of the agency charged with coordinating efforts to prevent and respond to acts of terrorism by funding DHS through the end of the fiscal year. This stands in stark contrast to House Republicans, who have refused to fund DHS unless the legislation also targets DREAMers, kids who were brought to this country through no fault of their own.

Bipartisan coalition introduces bill to protect states mineral royalties

LENGTH: 640 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Mike Enzi, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Mike Enzi, R-Wyo., Tom Udall, D-N.M., John Barrasso, R-Wyo., Representatives Cynthia Lummis, R-Wyo., Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., and Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., introduced legislation today that would allow states to collect their own mineral royalties, protecting money that is rightfully owed to the states. The bill would effectively eliminate a collection fee charged by the federal government, which amounts to around $40 million per year.

"For years, the federal government split the revenue 50-50, but only when it was short on money did it decide to squeeze a few states with this unfair surcharge," Enzi said. "By empowering states to collect their own mineral revenue, they would no longer have to worry about the federal government snatching up mineral royalties that are rightfully theirs."

"The federal government's unnecessary fee on mineral revenues takes money from state budgets -- money that many New Mexico communities depend to fund public schools, emergency response and other critical services," Udall said. "New Mexico earned these royalties from our abundant natural resources, and New Mexico communities deserve to keep their share of the revenues without federal interference."

"States are in the best position to make sure that their mineral revenues are properly paid and collected," Barrasso said. "Our bill will ensure Washington delivers on its obligation to mineral producing states while also making the process more efficient, cost effective and accountable."

"We need to stop Washington's taxing of state coffers to cover federal spending," Rep. Lummis said. "Citing administrative costs, the federal government has been taking an additional 2% annually that is owed to mineral states like Wyoming and New Mexico. To address this, I am pleased to re-introduce this legislation that I wrote last Congress to remove the federal middle man and allow states the option to collect their 50% share of royalties under the Mineral Leasing Act. I look forward to working with Sens. Enzi and Barrasso and my other colleagues in Congress to protect states' money by keeping it from needlessly leaving the states' borders."

"This bi-partisan bill will ensure New Mexico can keep its fair share of revenue and help the state invest in important priorities, including schools, infrastructure development, small businesses, and other public welfare and economic development programs," Rep. Lujan Grisham said.

"New Mexico's federal lands are a significant resource that provides important royalties that should be used to strengthen New Mexico," Rep. Luján said. "This legislation will ensure that more of the money that is rightfully owed to states will be returned in order to support vital programs and investments that make a difference in our communities. LUJAN AND FLEISCHMANN TO LEAD HOUSE NUCLEAR CLEANUP CAUCUS;
Hold First Meeting to Raise Awareness of Environmental Cleanup Issues;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 556 words

Washington, D.C. - United States Representatives Ben Ray Lujan (D-NM) and Chuck Fleischmann (R-TN) announced today they will serve as co-chairs of the House Nuclear Cleanup Caucus, which held its first meeting of the 114th Congress to discuss the importance of raising awareness of environmental management issues in Congress. Fifty years of government nuclear weapons development stemming from the Manhattan Project during World War II has affected communities across the nation and resulted in the need for environmental cleanup at numerous sites.

"The Nuclear Security Complex has a number of legacies that are deeply rooted in its regional communities. First amongst these is the legacy of service by members of the local community in support of the national defense," said Lujan, whose New Mexico district includes Los Alamos National Laboratory. "However, there is also the legacy of nuclear waste, which continues to threaten the current and future health and environment of these communities that have given so much to our nation. Moving forward we need to honor the legacy of service by fulfilling our obligation to clean up this legacy of waste in a safe, effective, and efficient manner. I look forward to working with Rep. Fleischmann, the rest of the caucus, and stakeholders, including the Regional Coalition of LANL Communities, which I recently met with to discuss the importance of environmental cleanup and our commitment to advocating for the resources to address waste at LANL."

"Our nation has a tremendous nuclear history, and with that has come an important nuclear cleanup mission. I am excited today to host the first meeting of the 114th Congress' Nuclear Cleanup Caucus with co-chair Lujan and members from across the country who have districts that are impacted," said Fleischmann, who represents the city of Oak Ridge. "I also want to thank Acting Assistant Secretary for Environmental Management, Mark Whitney, for taking part in this meeting. This Caucus will serve to promote the awareness of our nuclear legacy and build a stronger coalition to fight for the needs of our cleanup missions, and I am eager to get to work."

Today's meeting provided the first opportunity for members who represent cleanup sites and stakeholders to come together to discuss the importance of advocating for environmental cleanup and raising awareness with their colleagues in Congress. Members of the caucus were joined by Mark Whitney, Acting Assistant Secretary for Environmental Management at the Department of Energy.

"The Environmental Management program benefits from the continued focus and support from the Members of the Cleanup Caucus as we continue to make progress on completing cleanup at sites and in communities across the nation," said Whitney.

The Department of Energy's Office of Environmental Management has completed cleanup of 91 of the 107 sites where nuclear waste was generated as part of the federal nuclear security and energy research, development and production complex. The 16 remaining sites are spread across 11 states and include a number of large and complex sites, such as Hanford and Savannah River sites and Oak Ridge, Idaho, and Los Alamos National Laboratories.

Tom Udall, Martin Heinrich, Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham: Right-to-work legislation hurts working families

BYLINE: By Congressmen Tom Udall, Martin Heinrich, Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham Guest column

SECTION: OPINION

LENGTH: 564 words

As the national economy shows signs of real improvement, New Mexico's recovery has been challenging and slow. Working families want to know when we will see more jobs, higher salaries and access to quality education at every level. The state Legislature has an opportunity to put New Mexico in a position to provide that economic security and rebuild the middle class.

Unfortunately, the first bill to gain traction at the Roundhouse is a divisive plan backed by out-of-state political operatives designed to divide working families. The so-called right-to-work plan championed by special interests would do more harm than good. Consider these consequences

In states with similar anti-worker laws, workers earn, on average, $5,000 less each year than their counterparts in competing states.

Six in 10 states with the highest unemployment rates have these anti-worker laws.

Twelve of the 14 states with the worst pay gap between men and women are anti-worker states.

Workers in states with these anti-worker laws earn fewer benefits.

Worker safety suffers in these anti-worker states where the rate of deaths on the job is 54.4 percent higher.

The Legislature's Jobs Council has produced bipartisan ideas to create jobs and help rebuild New Mexico's economy. Democrats and Republicans got together with business and labor leaders, local and state officials and economic developers who endorsed these ideas.

So it is disheartening to see the new House Republican leadership using its newfound power to focus on legislation that would hurt working families. And it's disappointing to see voices of opposition silenced during committee debate on this issue.

We have opposed anti-worker policies like these at the federal level because unions have long provided benefits for all workers, regardless of membership, by fighting for benefits many now take for granted such as overtime, workplace safety and paid leave.

Legitimate studies are proving that anti-worker laws would weaken New Mexico's already struggling middle class. Employees with unions at their backs are able to help raise the bar on pay and benefits for all workers in every industry. Anti-worker laws diminish that power. That's why working families in New Mexico have stood strong against such policies every time outsider special interest groups have tried to force them on us.

The fact of the matter is that people are already free to join a union or not that's the law.

When corporate-backed special interest groups tell people to drop their union memberships, working people suffer the consequences. Non-union workers lose the guarantee that they will be heard when it comes to working conditions, benefits and wages. Working men and women in New Mexico know that real employee freedom means having a voice in the workplace.

The New Mexico Legislature has a history of standing up for working families. We urge state lawmakers to focus on growing our economy, creating well-paying 21st century jobs, investing in our schools and strengthening our middle class. There's so much good that can be done for our state, let's focus the effort where it will really count by putting New Mexico's working families first.

U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich are Democratics from New Mexico. U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Lujcn represents the 3rd Congressional District and Michell Lujan Grisham, the !st, in the House of Representatives.

Fifty years of government nuclear weapons development stemming from the Manhattan Project during World War II has affected communities across the nation and resulted in the need for environmental cleanup at numerous sites.

"The Nuclear Security Complex has a number of legacies that are deeply rooted in its regional communities. First amongst these is the legacy of service by members of the local community in support of the national defense," said Lujan, whose New Mexico district includes Los Alamos National Laboratory. "However, there is also the legacy of nuclear waste, which continues to threaten the current and future health and environment of these communities that have given so much to our nation. Moving forward we need to honor the legacy of service by fulfilling our obligation to clean up this legacy of waste in a safe, effective, and efficient manner. I look forward to working with Rep. Fleischmann, the rest of the caucus, and stakeholders, including the Regional Coalition of LANL Communities, which I recently met with to discuss the importance of environmental cleanup and our commitment to advocating for the resources to address waste at LANL."

"Our nation has a tremendous nuclear history, and with that has come an important nuclear cleanup mission. I am excited today to host the first meeting of the 114th Congress' Nuclear Cleanup Caucus with co-chair Lujan and members from across the country who have districts that are impacted," said Fleischmann, who represents the city of Oak Ridge. "I also want to thank Acting Assistant Secretary for Environmental Management, Mark Whitney, for taking part in this meeting. This Caucus will serve to promote the awareness of our nuclear legacy and build a stronger coalition to fight for the needs of our cleanup missions, and I am eager to get to work."

Today's meeting provided the first opportunity for members who represent cleanup sites and stakeholders to come together to discuss the importance of advocating for environmental cleanup and raising awareness with their colleagues in Congress. Members of the caucus were joined by Mark Whitney, Acting Assistant Secretary for Environmental Management at the Department of Energy.

"The Environmental Management program benefits from the continued focus and support from the Members of the Cleanup Caucus as we continue to make progress on completing cleanup at sites and in communities across the nation," said Whitney.

The Department of Energy's Office of Environmental Management has completed cleanup of 91 of the 107 sites where nuclear waste was generated as part of the federal nuclear security and energy research, development and production complex. The 16 remaining sites are spread across 11 states and include a number of large and complex sites, such as Hanford and Savannah River sites and Oak Ridge, Idaho, and Los Alamos National Laboratories.

Bipartisan Coalition Introduces Bill to Protect States Mineral Royalties

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 631 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The office of Sen. Michael B. Enzi, R-Wyo., issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Mike Enzi, R-Wyo., Tom Udall, D-N.M., John Barrasso, R-Wyo., Representatives Cynthia Lummis, R-Wyo., Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., and Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., introduced legislation today that would allow states to collect their own mineral royalties, protecting money that is rightfully owed to the states. The bill would effectively eliminate a collection fee charged by the federal government, which amounts to around $40 million per year.

"For years, the federal government split the revenue 50-50, but only when it was short on money did it decide to squeeze a few states with this unfair surcharge," Enzi said. "By empowering states to collect their own mineral revenue, they would no longer have to worry about the federal government snatching up mineral royalties that are rightfully theirs."

"The federal government's unnecessary fee on mineral revenues takes money from state budgets -- money that many New Mexico communities depend to fund public schools, emergency response and other critical services," Udall said.

"New Mexico earned these royalties from our abundant natural resources, and New Mexico communities deserve to keep their share of the revenues without federal interference."

"States are in the best position to make sure that their mineral revenues are properly paid and collected," Barrasso said. "Our bill will ensure Washington delivers on its obligation to mineral producing states while also making the process more efficient, cost effective and accountable."

"We need to stop Washington's taxing of state coffers to cover federal spending," Rep. Lummis said. "Citing administrative costs, the federal government has been taking an additional 2% annually that is owed to mineral states like Wyoming and New Mexico. To address this, I am pleased to re-introduce this legislation that I wrote last Congress to remove the federal middle man and allow states the option to collect their 50% share of royalties under the Mineral Leasing Act. I look forward to working with Sens. Enzi and Barrasso and my other colleagues in Congress to protect states' money by keeping it from needlessly leaving the states' borders."

"This bi-partisan bill will ensure New Mexico can keep its fair share of revenue and help the state invest in important priorities, including schools, infrastructure development, small businesses, and other public welfare and economic development programs," Rep. Lujan Grisham said.

"New Mexico's federal lands are a significant resource that provides important royalties that should be used to strengthen New Mexico," Rep. Lujan said. "This legislation will ensure that more of the money that is rightfully owed to states will be returned in order to support vital programs and investments that make a difference in our communities. Sending the money directly to the states and not to the federal government first will streamline the process, reduce administrative costs, and allow states to receive more of these critical funds."

The Mineral Leasing Act provides that the continental states be paid 50 percent of the revenues resulting from the leasing of mineral resources on federal public domain lands within their borders. These royalties are used by states to fund such necessary items as public school systems, community colleges, emergency response activities and basic infrastructure projects.

Currently, the federal government charges states a 2 percent fee to cover collection and disbursement costs. This legislation would ensure that states can continue to receive their 50 percent share of mineral royalties by giving them the option to administer their own programs.

US Federal Communications Commission, The Government of USA has published the following document:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION
WASHINGTON OFFICE OF THE CHAIRMAN
The Honorable Michelle Lujan Grisham
U.S. House of Representatives
214 Cannon House Office Building
Washington, D.C. 20515
Dear Congresswoman Grisham:
January 29, 2015
Thank you for your letter supporting the rural broadband experiments application submitted by The High Plains Regional Education Cooperative and Terastream Broadband (Terastream). Your views are very important and will be included in the record of the proceeding.

In January of last year, the Commission initiated an experiment to inform om policies to build the next generation networks in rural America and invited proposals on whether there is interest in constructing high-bandwidth networks in high-cost areas . This experiment has allowed us to explore how to structure the CAF Phase II competitive bidding process in price-cap areas and gather valuable information about deploying next-generation networks in high-cost areas. We issued an invitation, and the response was astounding. We received nearly 1,000 expressions of interest from all parts of the country and from a wide range of entities, including rural telephone companies, rural electric co-ops, cable and wireless service providers, schools and libraries, research and education networks, and communities.
In July 2014, we adopted a $100 million budget for the rural broadband experiments and established an objective methodology for selecting projects an1ong formal applications, which were due between October 23 and November 7, 2014. In total, 181 applicants proposed to serve over 76,000 census blocks in all 50 states and Puerto Rico.
On December 5, 2014, we announced the provisionally selected bidders. The provisionally selected bidders bid on support to cover 26,867 census blocks in 25 states and Puerto Rico. Terastream' s submission was one of the provisionally selected bidders under category one, or entities seeking support to build networks capable of delivering 100 Mbps downstream and 25 Mbps upstream. Its provisionally selected bid is comprised of 149 census blocks in New Mexico.
I look forward to working with you as we continue the work of reforming and modernizing the USF high-cost program- as well as other components of the Fund- to ensure that all Americans have access to robust voice and broadband services.

I appreciate your interest in this matter. Please let me know if I can be of any further assistance.

Dear Senator Heinrich:

January 29, 2015

Thank you for your letter supporting the rural broadband experiments application submitted by The High Plains Regional Education Cooperative and Terastream Broadband (Terastream). Your views are very important and will be included in the record of the proceeding.

In January oflast year, the Commission initiated an experiment to inform our policies to build the next generation networks in rural America and invited proposals on whether there is interest in constructing high-bandwidth networks in high-cost areas. This experiment has allowed us to explore how to structure the CAF Phase II competitive bidding process in price-cap areas and gather valuable information about deploying next-generation networks in high-cost areas. We issued an invitation, and the response was astounding. We received nearly 1,000 expressions of interest from all parts of the country and from a wide range of entities, including rural telephone companies, rural electric co-ops, cable and wireless service providers, schools and libraries, research and education networks, and communities.

In July 2014, we adopted a $100 million budget for the rural broadband experiments and established an objective methodology for selecting projects among formal applications, which were due between October 23 and November 7, 2014. In total, 181 applicants proposed to serve over 76,000 census blocks in all 50 states and Puerto Rico .

On December 5, 2014, we announced the provisionally selected bidders. The provisionally selected bidders bid on support to cover 26,867 census blocks in 25 states and Puerto Rico. Terastream 's submission was one of the provisionally selected bidders under category one, or entities seeking support to build networks capable of delivering 100 Mbps downstream and 25 Mbps upstream. Its provisionally selected bid is comprised of 149 census blocks in New Mexico.

I look forward to working with you as we continue the work of reforming and modernizing the USF high-cost program - as well as other components of the Fund - to ensure that all Americans have access to robust voice and broadband services.

NM delegation mostly backs use of force against IS; Pearce wants open-ended deal; others want curbs on president

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: FRONT PAGE; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 954 words

WASHINGTON - As the White House prepares to ask Congress for a resolution formally authorizing U.S. military force against the Islamic State terror group, New Mexico's delegation is wary but eager to see details of the proposal.

White House spokesman Josh Earnest told reporters in Washington on Tuesday that President Obama will likely send Congress a proposed agreement on a use-of-force authorization this week, possibly as soon as today. The announcement came on the same day the White House confirmed the death of 26-year-old aid worker Kayla Jean Mueller, who spent more than a year in Islamic State captivity.

"No matter how long it takes, the United States will find and bring to justice the terrorists who are responsible for Kayla's captivity and death," Obama said in a statement. "ISIL is a hateful and abhorrent terrorist group whose actions stand in stark contrast to the spirit of people like Kayla."

Sen. Tom Udall, a New Mexico Democrat who sits on the Senate Foreign Relations Commit- tee, in December proposed limiting the scope of the force authorization to one year and securing a commitment that the use of force wouldn't extend beyond Iraq and Syria without congressional approval. Both proposals, which had the support of Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky., failed in a vote of the committee.

"ISIS is a brutal terrorist group that must be stopped, but I'm very concerned about an open-ended authorization with no limits on time or geography," Udall told the Journal in a statement late Tuesday. "I am still very concerned about any authorization that might put us on a path toward sending ground troops to the Middle East."

However, Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., said he would not support an authorization that contained timelines or otherwise restricted the U.S. military from in its efforts to eliminate the Islamic State group.

"By laying out a strategy that does not limit the amount of troops, place artificial timelines, or expect our military to complete the mission through repeated deployments by the same soldiers, the administration can prevent placing the military at an operational disadvantage from the start," Pearce said. "As I stated in September, after the president's announced action against ISIS, if we are going to risk the lives of our troops, we must follow through. We must complete the mission."

The Islamic State group, formerly known as the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant, or ISIL, has seized territory in Iraq and Syria and tortured and killed hostages from the United States and allied countries. The U.S. has been engaged against the terror group militarily for months, but Obama wants an official use-of-force authorization from Congress. Earnest said White House officials were meeting with Republicans and Democrats on Capitol Hill on Tuesday to try to craft language that would win bipartisan support.

"He does believe it would be a powerful symbol for the Congress to send to the American people, to our allies and even to our enemies that the United States of America is united behind the strategy the president has laid out to degrade and ultimately destroy ISIL," Earnest said.

Earnest said Obama is confident he does not legally need permission from Congress to engage the Islamic State group militarily, but he would prefer to have it. The White House has been battling the terror group under previous congressional authorizations of force against Iraq and al-Qaida, as well as his executive authority over the military under the Constitution. The Obama administration wants to repeal the 2002 Iraq war authorization as part of the new measure and retain the 2001 resolution against al-Qaida.

Bloomberg News, citing unnamed congressional sources, reported that the White House will place strict limits on the types of U.S. ground forces that can be deployed.

Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., said Congress has a responsibility to go on the record about the use of force against the Islamic State fighters.

"If we are going to ask Americans to risk their lives, then Congress cannot shirk its responsibility," said Heinrich, who has co-sponsored legislation that would bar the introduction of U.S. ground troops against the Islamic State. "The legislative branch has a fundamental and moral responsibility to consider the use of military force and cast a vote yea or nay."

Heinrich also said the U.S. should not have to wage the fight alone.

"America will do our part, but countries in the region must provide the ground troops to protect and stabilize their own backyard," he said. "That is not our role."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., said she appreciated the White House plan to ask Congress to weigh in, but like other members of the delegation she said she would remain noncommittal until seeing details of the president's plan. Lujan Grisham and many other Democrats have expressed deep reservations about any proposal that would commit U.S. ground troops.

"Like many of my constituents, I have important questions and concerns that need to be addressed before I can consider additional military action," she said.

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., said, "Congress and the president must work together to ensure that any AUMF to address the threat of ISIL has clear goals, a clear exit, is precise, and does not commit U.S. combat troops on the ground. The path forward must also involve a greater commitment from our allies in the region and a focus on disrupting ISIL's access to funding and weapons. I will look closely at the AUMF to see if it meets these standards."

Earnest told reporters Tuesday that he hopes Congress will move quickly to approve the White House request.

"The president does believe that this message is even more powerful if it has bipartisan support," he said.

Lujan Joins Bipartisan Effort to Improve Email Privacy Protections

LENGTH: 254 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján announced today that he has joined in a bipartisan effort to update and improve privacy protections for electronic communications. Luján and more than 230 members of the House introduced legislation to update the Electronic Communications Privacy Act (ECPA), which has not been updated since 1986 despite substantial changes in technology.

"In the nearly 30 years since ECPA was written we have seen amazing technological progress that has brought us new tools to communicate. Yet in that time, our laws have not kept up with these changes," Congressman Luján said. "From cloud computing to smartphones, many of the technologies that are part of our daily lives did not even exist. It is long past time to update ECPA to reflect the developments in technology and to ensure the American people have important privacy protections."

The Electronic Communications Privacy Amendments Act of 2015 requires the government to get a search warrant based on a showing of probable cause in order to access email and other data in the cloud. It replaces the "180-day rule" which has been used to gain warrantless access to emails that are on a server for more than 180 days. The legislation protects privacy while also preserving the legal tools necessary to conduct criminal investigations.

N.M. Delegation, UNM Announce that Proposal to Create National Institute of Photonics will Advance to Final Round

LENGTH: 1163 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Michelle Lujan Grisham, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Today, U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján, and Michelle Lujan Grisham, along with the University of New Mexico, announced that the Department of Defense has selected a team that includes UNM as a finalist for the administration's new Integrated Photonics Institute for Manufacturing Innovation (IP-IMI) program. The initiative is part of a national effort launched in 2013 to create a network of regional manufacturing institutes or "hubs" across the county that help bridge the gap between applied research and product development.

UNM will collaborate with a team of academic institutions from four states, led by the Information Science Institute ISI at the University of Southern California, to compete for $110 million in federal grant matching funds to develop a partnership between industry, government and academia to accelerate the creation of new photonics technologies. The mission is to establish a state-of-the-art in the design, manufacture, testing, assembly and packaging of complex photonic integrated circuits that combine a variety of photonic and electronic components to achieve functionality.

The New Mexico congressional delegation has strongly supported New Mexico's application. If its application is successful, the USC-UNM hub would be the first hub west of the Mississippi. UNM would serve as the lead sensing hub, focusing on the development of integrated phonic sensors for chem-bio sensing.

"New Mexico's congressional delegation is united in our strong support for UNM's application, and we are committed to doing everything we can to help the team succeed," Udall said. "Our universities, military, business and scientific communities already are among the world's leading developers of advanced photonics technologies. Not only would the UNM team position the nation to be a global leader in the photonics field, the photonics hub would help New Mexico by boosting efforts to diversify the state's economy and create well-paying high-tech jobs."

"The University of New Mexico and its coalition of universities perform some of the world's most cutting-edge research and development in the field of optics and photonics technologies," Heinrich said. "New Mexico's private companies, universities, national labs, research facilities, and immeasurable talent make us a leading contender for the Department of Defense's Integrated Photonics Manufacturing Institute. In New Mexico, we develop photonics technologies that are used in the military, scientific, medical, and intelligence communities. Establishing a photonics hub will help give our communities an economic boost and create quality jobs, while bridging the gap between applied research and product development. I remain steadfast in my commitment to give UNM's coalition the best shot at this opportunity."

"The advancement of New Mexico to the next round of the IP-IMI process is a testament to the research and development culture in our state," Pearce said. "I commend the University of New Mexico on this latest achievement and I join my colleagues in continued support for New Mexico's involvement in this critical research."

"It is welcome news that UNM is part of a team that has been selected to submit a full proposal for the Integrated Photonics Institute for Manufacturing Innovation," Luján said. "This selection validates New Mexico's national stature in this important field that plays an essential role in robotics, medical imaging, biometric security, and more. Having a hub at UNM would enable New Mexico to play an even greater role and leverage our unique resources to advance this critical sector that can help diversify our economy and spur new opportunities in our communities."

"This is a tremendous opportunity for New Mexico to step up and take a leadership role in this burgeoning industry, while creating high-wage jobs that will boost our economic comeback," Lujan Grisham said.

The USC-UNM team also includes the University of California system schools in Los Angeles, San Diego and Berkeley; Arizona State University; and Ohio State University The team will compete against two others based in New York and Florida. Full and final applications are due by March 31, and the final selection is expected in June 2015.

"The University of New Mexico already has strong partnerships with our national labs, city and state governments and local industry. We want to enhance those assets in every way we can," UNM President Robert G. Frank said. "This grant would be a fantastic accelerator."

Sanjay Krishna, who directs the Center for High Technology Materials at UNM, has been leading UNM's effort. UNM is currently working with the state and the city of Albuquerque to secure matching funds to develop an integrated photonics curriculum for high schools, colleges and UNM branch campuses as part of a workforce development and education plan.

"I believe that photonics could be an enabling technology that can spur economic development and create new opportunities for entrepreneurs," Krishna said. "Our close interaction with the federal and national labs is a great strength and our interactions with high schools, community colleges, branch campuses and other universities could create a K through PhD workforce."

Ultimately, the IP-IMI will be an end-to-end integrated photonics manufacturing "ecosystem." It will include integrated design tools for efficient simulation and design of integrated photonic circuits, domestic photonic device fabrication foundry access, automated packaging, assembly and test of integrated photonic circuits, and workforce development. Activities under the IP-IMI will enable universities and small-to-medium enterprises to participate in the integrated photonics revolution. It will bring government, industry and academia together with the goal of organizing the current fragmented domestic capabilities in integrated photonic technology and better position the U.S. relative to global competition.

The IP-IMI is the newest addition to the federal government's new National Network for Manufacturing Innovation, a series of manufacturing "hubs" intended to bridge the gap between applied research and product development by bringing together companies, universities and other academic and training institutions, and federal agencies to co invest in key technology areas that encourage investment and production in the United States.

This type of "teaching factory" provides a unique opportunity for education and training of students and workers at all levels, while providing the shared assets to help small manufacturers and other companies access the cutting-edge capabilities and equipment to design, test, and pilot new products and manufacturing processes.

UNM a finalist to land $110M photonics institute

BYLINE: Mike English

LENGTH: 270 words

The University of New Mexico has advanced to the final round of a selection process for the $110 million Integrated Photonics Institute for Manufacturing Innovation program, a new federal project that would help turn research into commercial products.

The New Mexico congressional delegation - Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, along with Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham - joined UNM in announcing Thursday that the U.S. Department of Defense has selected UNM and a team of schools from four states, including the University of Southern California, to potentially run a regional manufacturing institute.

The $110 million would be used to develop partnerships between industry, government and academia to commercialize new photonics technologies. UNM Center for High Technology Materials Director Sanjay Krishna has been leading the university's effort.

"The University of New Mexico already has strong partnerships with our national labs, city and state governments and local industry. We want to enhance those assets in every way we can," UNM President Robert Frank said in a release. "This grant would be a fantastic accelerator."

Udall said the state's members of Congress will do all they can to help secure UNM's involvement in the program. "We are committed to doing everything we can to help the team succeed," he said in the release.

LUJAN JOINS BIPARTISAN EFFORT TO IMPROVE EMAIL PRIVACY PROTECTIONS;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 243 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan announced today that he has joined in a bipartisan effort to update and improve privacy protections for electronic communications. Lujan and more than 230 members of the House introduced legislation to update the Electronic Communications Privacy Act (ECPA), which has not been updated since 1986 despite substantial changes in technology.

"In the nearly 30 years since ECPA was written we have seen amazing technological progress that has brought us new tools to communicate. Yet in that time, our laws have not kept up with these changes," Congressman Lujan said. "From cloud computing to smartphones, many of the technologies that are part of our daily lives did not even exist. It is long past time to update ECPA to reflect the developments in technology and to ensure the American people have important privacy protections."

The Electronic Communications Privacy Amendments Act of 2015 requires the government to get a search warrant based on a showing of probable cause in order to access email and other data in the cloud. It replaces the "180-day rule" which has been used to gain warrantless access to emails that are on a server for more than 180 days. The legislation protects privacy while also preserving the legal tools necessary to conduct criminal investigations.

Proposal to Create National Institute of Photonics Advances to Final Round

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 1030 words

DATELINE: ALBUQUERQUE, N.M.

The University of New Mexico issued the following news release:

A consortium, that includes the University of New Mexico, is bidding for $110 million in federal funds for a new Integrated Photonics Institute for Manufacturing Innovation (IP-IMI). The consortium has advanced to the final round of competition, the Department of Defense announced recently.

The initiative is part of a national effort launched in 2013 to create a network of regional manufacturing institutes or "hubs" across the county that help bridge the gap between applied research and product development.

The mission is to establish a state-of-the-art hub focusing on the design, manufacture, testing, assembly and packaging of complex photonic integrated circuits that combine a variety of photonic and electronic components to achieve functionality.

The program calls for UNM to collaborate with a team of academic institutions from four states, led by the Information Science Institute ISI at University of Southern California. The $110 million in federal grant matching funds will help develop a partnership between industry, government and academia to accelerate the creation of new photonics technologies.

"The University of New Mexico already has strong partnerships with our national labs, city and state governments and local industry," UNM President Robert G. Frank said. "We want to enhance those assets in every way we can. This grant would be a fantastic accelerator."

Sanjay Krishna, UNM School of Engineering professor in computer and electrical engineering, directs UNM's Center for High Technology Materials (CHTM) and has been leading UNM's effort. UNM is currently working with the state and the city of Albuquerque to secure matching funds to develop an integrated photonics curriculum for high schools, colleges and UNM branch campuses as part of a workforce development and education plan.

"I believe that photonics could be an enabling technology that can spur economic development and create new opportunities for entrepreneurs," Krishna said. "Our close interaction with the federal and national labs is a great strength and our interactions with high schools, community colleges, branch campuses and other universities could create a K through PhD workforce."

Ultimately, the IP-IMI will be an end-to-end integrated photonics manufacturing "ecosystem." It will include integrated design tools for efficient simulation and design of integrated photonic circuits, domestic photonic device fabrication foundry access, automated packaging, assembly and test of integrated photonic circuits, and workforce development.

Activities under the IP-IMI will enable universities and small-to-medium enterprises to participate in the integrated photonics revolution. It will bring government, industry and academia together with the goal of organizing the current fragmented domestic capabilities in integrated photonic technology and better position the U.S. relative to global competition.

If successful, the USC-UNM hub would be the first west of the Mississippi. UNM would serve as the lead sensing hub, focusing on the development of integrated phonic sensors for chem-bio sensing.

The USC-UNM team also includes the University of California system schools in Los Angeles, San Diego and Berkeley; Arizona State University; and Ohio State University. The team will compete against two others based in New York and Florida. Full and final applications are due by March 31, and the final selection is expected in June 2015.

The New Mexico congressional delegation: U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Lujan, Michelle Lujan Grisham and Steve Pearce are all in support of the program.

"Our universities, military, business and scientific communities already are among the world's leading developers of advanced photonics technologies," said Udall. "Not only would the UNM team position the nation to be a global leader in the photonics field, the photonics hub would help New Mexico by boosting efforts to diversify the state's economy and create well-paying high-tech jobs."

"The University of New Mexico and its coalition of universities perform some of the world's most cutting-edge research and development in the field of optics and photonics technologies," Heinrich said. "New Mexico's private companies, universities, national labs, research facilities, and immeasurable talent make us a leading contender."

"It is welcome news that UNM is part of a team that has been selected to submit a full proposal for the Integrated Photonics Institute for Manufacturing Innovation," Lujan said. "Having a hub at UNM would enable New Mexico to play an even greater role and leverage our unique resources to advance this critical sector that can help diversify our economy and spur new opportunities in our communities."

"This is a tremendous opportunity for New Mexico to step up and take a leadership role in this burgeoning industry, while creating high-wage jobs that will boost our economic comeback," Lujan Grisham said.

"The advancement of New Mexico to the next round of the IP-IMI process is a testament to the research and development culture in our state," Pearce said. "I commend the University of New Mexico on this latest achievement and I join my colleagues in continued support for New Mexico's involvement in this critical research."

The IP-IMI is the newest addition to the federal government's new National Network for Manufacturing Innovation, a series of manufacturing "hubs" intended to bridge the gap between applied research and product development by bringing together companies, universities and other academic and training institutions, and federal agencies to co invest in key technology areas that encourage investment and production in the United States.

This type of "teaching factory" provides a unique opportunity for education and training of students and workers at all levels, while providing the shared assets to help small manufacturers and other companies access the cutting-edge capabilities and equipment to design, test, and pilot new products and manufacturing processes.

LUJAN STATEMENT ON HOUSE REPUBLICANS' LATEST ATTEMPT TO REPEAL THE ACA;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 176 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after House Republicans once again voted to fully repeal the Affordable Care Act (ACA).

"Once again House Republicans voted to repeal the Affordable Care Act and take away health insurance for millions of Americans without offering any alternative. Their plan would put insurance companies back in charge, enabling them to discriminate based on pre-existing conditions. In New Mexico, more than 214,000 people are receiving health care thanks to the ACA and the ranks of the uninsured have dropped by 5 percent.

"It is disappointing that instead of focusing on middle-class economics, passing a clean bill to fund the Department of Homeland Security, or addressing comprehensive immigration reform, House Republicans are once again playing politics with yet another vote to repeal the Affordable Care Act."

Lujan Statement on Black History Month

LENGTH: 258 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today in recognition of Black History Month, which is celebrated in February.

"This month we celebrate Black History Month and reflect on the enduring contributions of a community whose vibrant culture and rich traditions are an integral part of the fabric of our great nation. In all sectors of American society - as business owners, educators, members of the armed services, and more - the African American community has played a leading role.

"During Black History Month we are reminded of the tireless efforts of so many who committed themselves to the pursuit of social justice and equality and whose efforts paved the way for so much progress. It is because of their work that this year we remember the 50th anniversary of the march in Selma and the passage of the Voting Rights Act.

"Let us honor the unwavering spirit of the men and women who would not be deterred from their struggle for justice by continuing the fight for equal access at the ballot box and strengthening the Voting Rights Act so that every citizen can exercise his or her fundamental right to vote. In doing so we not only remember the legacy of those who were driven by the struggle for equality, we also honor the dreams and aspirations of the next generation."

Lujan Statement on President Obama's Budget Proposal

LENGTH: 238 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on President Obama's Fiscal Year 2016 budget proposal.

"The President's budget puts the focus where it should be - on middle-class economics. President Obama has offered a number of ideas to address the squeeze that is gripping middle-class families. By concentrating on growing paychecks and investing in the critical areas that grow our economy, the President's budget stands in stark contrast to House Republicans' trickle-down policies that only focus on those at the top.

"The President's focus on expanding early education and investing in STEM education is critical to helping New Mexico's children get ahead. I am encouraged by the overall funding levels for New Mexico's national labs, but I will continue to advocate for more funding for environmental cleanup in the appropriations process. The arbitrary budget cuts of the sequester have harmed New Mexico, and by reversing this policy that led to Head Start centers shutting down, workers being furloughed, and cuts to the national labs, the President's budget takes important steps to support investments that are essential to New Mexico's future."

Legislative Roundup;
Days remaining in session: 29

BYLINE: The New Mexican

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 15

LENGTH: 777 words

Homegrown lab management: Northern New Mexico's representative in Congress called on the state Legislature to lead a movement toward homegrown management of the national laboratories in the state.

Addressing a joint session on Thursday, U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N. M., said lucrative federal contracts to manage Los Alamos National Laboratory and Sandia National Laboratory, in particular, present a unique economic development opportunity in the financially struggling state. He said the Legislature should explore ways to assemble a consortium capable of managing the labs.

Sandia's management contract is in the process of being rebid, and the contract with Los Alamos National Security, the private contractor that manages LANL, expires Oct. 1, 2017.

U.S. Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N. M., addressed the Legislature on Tuesday and urged bipartisan cooperation. He emphasized the importance of oil and gas to the state's economy. On Wednesday, in another joint session of the Legislature, U.S. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N. M., touched on the woeful state of behavioral health care in the state.

Extracting New Mexico from its economic malaise was common theme in the congressional delegates' speeches. Luján said it's time for the state to chart a new economic path. "New Mexico is at a crossroads ... ," he said. "The signs of economic recovery are all around us, but yet seem to be passing us by."

Breaking fast: Native New Mexican and critically acclaimed actor Steven Michael Quezada and his wife, Cherise, ordered breakfast burritos with avocado, his with green chile, at the Roundhouse cafeteria on Thursday.

Quezada, who portrayed federal agent Steven Gomez in the popular TV series "Breaking Bad," was at the Capitol to track education issues in his capacity as a member of the Albuquerque school board.

Webcast archives killed: The House Appropriations and Finance Committee on Thursday voted down a proposal to archive Internet videos of legislative committee hearings. On a party-line 7-5 vote, with Republicans in opposition, House Resolution 2, sponsored by Rep. Jeff Steinborn, D-Las Cruces, was tabled.

Currently, committee hearings are broadcast online during the legislative session, but they are not archived. Gov. Susana Martinez's office webcasts selected proceedings, including floor sessions of the House and Senate, which are archived on the governor's website.

After voting down the bill to archive committee hearing webcasts, the House Appropriations and Finance Committee approved a separate measure, House Concurrent Resolution 1, also sponsored by Steinborn, to webcast interim committee meetings when feasible, but without archiving them. That proposal received a "do pass" recommendation on a unanimous vote. Next, it moves to the House Rules and Order of Business Committee.

Stay away: The House on a 66-0 vote Thursday passed legislation that would allow rape victims to ask judges to impose permanent restraining orders against their convicted attackers.

Racheal Gonzales of Grants has been the public face of House Bill 123. Her biological father was sentenced to prison for raping her when she was a child. She has told legislative committees that for victims, the periodic expiration of restraining orders is at best inconvenient, and at worst terrifying.

The bill now moves to the Senate.

Looking ahead: The House Appropriations and Finance Committee was scheduled to consider a revised state budget proposal that reflects a downward turn in revenue expectations, driven by falling oil prices, during its meeting at 8:30 a.m. Friday in Room 307.

o U.S. Sen. Tom Udall, D-N. M., was scheduled to take his turn in addressing state legislators at 10:15 a.m. today. His office said Udall "will call on lawmakers to work together and focus on improving the well-being of New Mexico's children."

o KNME-TV's public affairs show New Mexico in Focus will air a segment today asking state lawmakers how they are trying to help children and families. Among scheduled guests for the broadcast, which airs at 7 p.m. on Channel 5.1 and repeats at 7 a.m. Sunday, are Rep. Gail Chasey, D-Albuquerque, Sen. Gay Kernan, R-Hobbs, and Sen. John Sapien, D-Corrales.

Quote of the day: "That's an applause line." -- U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N. M., when a joint session of the Legislature greeted his proclaimed support for economic development initiatives with silence.

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today in recognition of Black History Month, which is celebrated in February.

"This month we celebrate Black History Month and reflect on the enduring contributions of a community whose vibrant culture and rich traditions are an integral part of the fabric of our great nation. In all sectors of American society - as business owners, educators, members of the armed services, and more - the African American community has played a leading role.

"During Black History Month we are reminded of the tireless efforts of so many who committed themselves to the pursuit of social justice and equality and whose efforts paved the way for so much progress. It is because of their work that this year we remember the 50th anniversary of the march in Selma and the passage of the Voting Rights Act.

"Let us honor the unwavering spirit of the men and women who would not be deterred from their struggle for justice by continuing the fight for equal access at the ballot box and strengthening the Voting Rights Act so that every citizen can exercise his or her fundamental right to vote. In doing so we not only remember the legacy of those who were driven by the struggle for equality, we also honor the dreams and aspirations of the next generation."

Lujan Statement on President Obama's Budget Proposal

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 224 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on President Obama's Fiscal Year 2016 budget proposal.

"The President's budget puts the focus where it should be - on middle-class economics. President Obama has offered a number of ideas to address the squeeze that is gripping middle-class families. By concentrating on growing paychecks and investing in the critical areas that grow our economy, the President's budget stands in stark contrast to House Republicans' trickle-down policies that only focus on those at the top.

"The President's focus on expanding early education and investing in STEM education is critical to helping New Mexico's children get ahead. I am encouraged by the overall funding levels for New Mexico's national labs, but I will continue to advocate for more funding for environmental cleanup in the appropriations process. The arbitrary budget cuts of the sequester have harmed New Mexico, and by reversing this policy that led to Head Start centers shutting down, workers being furloughed, and cuts to the national labs, the President's budget takes important steps to support investments that are essential to New Mexico's future."

Senate gets ready to take the test;
NCLB rewrite will wrestle with how much is too much

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1925 words

WASHINGTON - If there is one thing that the divided U.S. Congress can agree on, it's that the federal No Child Left Behind education law is woefully outdated.

The law, enacted in 2001, aimed to make states more accountable for the millions of federal education dollars they receive each year, in large part through standardized student testing.

No Child Left Behind did, in fact, force states and local school districts to focus on improving student test scores, paying particular attention to minority and developmentally disabled children who often lagged behind. But many parents, teachers, administrators, state education leaders and members of Congress - including those from New Mexico - complain that the law overemphasizes standardized testing at the expense of classroom instruction that prepares students for the next grade level, college or the real world.

The political calculus on the standardized testing issue is tangled, with Republicans in Washington generally pushing for less testing - or at least fewer federal testing mandates - and Republicans in New Mexico generally favoring tests as a measure of progress.

Democrats and teachers' unions in New Mexico argue that testing requirements - with results factored into teacher evaluations - are unfair and counterproductive to effective classroom teaching. Meanwhile, many Democrats in Washington are averse to proposals to minimize the federal testing mandates.

NM views

In the eight years since the No Child Left Behind law expired, Congress has been unable or unwilling to rewrite and re-enact the contro- versial law, which states must still adhere to unless granted a waiver by the U.S. Department of Education.

With Republicans now controlling the House and Senate, the political inertia surrounding the expired education law appears to be dissipating. Sen. Lamar Alexander, a Tennessee Republican and former U.S. education secretary under President George H.W. Bush, last week convened a Senate education committee hearing to begin rewriting the law. Rep. John Kline, a Minnesota Republican who is chairman of the House education committee, is expected to follow suit.

"They seem to be focusing on the real issues, so I think it's going to be a priority," said Sen. Tom Udall, a New Mexico Democrat. "I want it to be a priority."

In Journal interviews last week, Udall and the three other Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation agreed the NCLB law needs to be rewritten and standardized testing de-emphasized - at least somewhat. But they also cautioned against stripping away too much federal oversight as part of the legislative overhaul. The Department of Education uses testing and achievement scores to track progress.

"It's important that the federal role in education is not drastically reduced," said Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M. "That's one of the most important roles of the federal government - oversight."

Rep. Steve Pearce, the New Mexico delegation's only Republican, said he would prefer that the feds leave education policy strictly to the states, echoing a common theme of conservative Republicans.

"We're trying to make a system work that is like a Model T (antique car)," Pearce said of No Child Left Behind. "You can add all the grease and oil you want, but it's still going to be a Model T. It's time to rethink education as a whole."

Back home

Meanwhile, Republican Gov. Susana Martinez and her education secretary-designate, Hanna Skandera, say that while the federal No Child Left Behind law is outdated, student testing is critical to evaluating teachers and sparking educational progress.

"As we look toward reauthorization ... we need to focus on the fact that school accountability is absolutely important," Skandera said in a Journal interview. "But it's got to be done at the local level, not defined or dictated by the federal government."

In the absence of an up-to-date federal education law, New Mexico and some other states are operating under waiver extensions that allow them to accept federal dollars in exchange for tying student test scores to their new teacher evaluation system, among other requirements.

New Mexico also included the adoption of the Common Core State Standards as part of its waiver. Forty-six states have adopted the Common Core State Standards, but Indiana has since repealed the standards and other states have introduced legislation to repeal. New Mexico state education officials remain committed to Common Core. Common Core is an unprecedented nationwide effort to ensure students in every state are taught - and tested on - the same set of high academic math and reading standards.

In November, New Mexico was among seven states the U.S. Education Department deemed eligible to apply for a four-year waiver from the requirements of No Child Left Behind, compared with three-year extensions for most other states.

Train wreck?

Democratic Sen. Martin Heinrich of New Mexico has two young sons who attended public elementary schools in Albuquerque before the family moved to the Washington, D.C., area in 2013. Heinrich said he has firsthand knowledge of the testing burden placed on New Mexico children and that testing is going to be a big part of the discussion" as Congress moves forward with its NCLB overhaul.

Heinrich's kids are now in public schools in suburban Maryland, which is also wrestling with complaints about federal testing standards. Maryland Gov. Larry Hogan, a Republican, has called education reforms to meet federal mandates in Maryland "a train wreck."

"There is broad consensus that NCLB needs to be rewritten, that it's not meeting the goals that were articulated when it was created," Heinrich said. "The difficulty is going to be how it should be rewritten. I do think there is too much testing, and too much testing that is not useful to instruction."

Heinrich said if the federal government is going to maintain national testing policies, it needs to do a better job.

"We have an existing role represented by No Child Left Behind that I don't think has been as helpful as it should be," he said. "We need to get that right. We need to rewrite it in a way that better aligns with local goals without being redundant, so you're not having situations where kids are being tested on a state test, a federal test and a local test, and losing a big chunk of their annual school year to evaluation that could be spent on instruction."

Former Sen. Jeff Bingaman, a New Mexico Democrat, was one of the key architects of the No Child Left Behind Law and worked with the late Sen. Ted Kennedy, current House Speaker John Boehner and former President George W. Bush to pass the legislation in 2001.

Bingaman said the overemphasis on testing isn't all the federal government's fault and that Common Core has helped ease the burden.

"A substantial amount of the testing, states were doing before the federal law ever passed," Bingaman said, stressing that testing remains the best way to account for federal education spending. "The solution is not to quit testing but to consolidate the testing. This movement toward Common Core standards, I think, makes that feasible. Most states are signed up and sticking with the idea of common standards, so you're to a point where, if you test to see if students are meeting those standards, that should be adequate for the federal government to decide whether its concerns are met."

Bingaman also positioned himself as a relatively rare - at least these days - defender of No Child Left Behind.

"I think that the law, overall, has had the effect of making schools reassess what they were doing," he said. "The idea that each state has to have a plan for improving student performance and then demonstrate by testing that they are actually improving performance has been a positive thing."

Alexander, the current Senate education committee chairman, disagreed. He has floated a draft "discussion" bill that offers two paths forward on student testing: Let states decide how much to test or retain the federally driven testing provisions contained in the expired NCLB law.

Alexander wants the committee to pass an NCLB rewrite by late February. Last week, he made clear which path on testing he prefers.

"Given all of the great progress that states and local school districts have made on standards, accountability, tests and teacher evaluation over the past 30 years, you'll get a lot more progress with a lot less opposition if you leave those decisions there," he told an education hearing on Capitol Hill last week. "I think we should return to state and local school district decisions for measuring the progress of our schools, and for evaluating and measuring the effectiveness of teachers."

Like Bingaman, Udall said federal testing mandates help provide proof that federal taxpayers are getting an adequate bang for the bucks they spend on education.

"The states run the education systems, but let's not forget how much money comes in from the federal government - targeted money to try to do a better job for students and teachers," Udall said. "We do a lot in teacher training, and we try to target the students who aren't doing well and who are under-achievers. When you spend those kinds of dollars, we have to make sure there is accountability - some kind of measurement - and that's where you get into the testing arena."

NM spending

New Mexico spends about $2.6 billion annually on elementary and secondary education, with state and local funding accounting for the vast majority - just under $2.4 billion of that amount, according to the state Legislative Finance Committee.

Gary King, a Democrat who ran for governor last year, said during the campaign that he might be willing to give up the tens of millions of dollars in federal education funding simply to get out from under burdensome federal testing requirements.

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., said the Obama administration's approach to education over the past six years has exacerbated a problem of too much testing created by No Child Left Behind. Citing New Mexico as a prime example, she said states have shifted their focus from practical classroom instruction to teaching for test preparation. She also said that, in many cases, teachers haven't been adequately trained to prepare students for the tests.

"The Obama administration has been part of the problem, and what I mean specifically is they have really worked to give states the flexibility to figure out teachers' accountability," Lujan Grisham said. "But that accountability has (reduced) states' investments in helping teachers succeed and instead penalizes teachers by not having them be a part of the evaluation process and by not including them in how the testing apparatus should look. The states are (implementing) their own tests that don't quite work. New Mexico is a lead example on where those struggles are the most defined and having the most devastating impact, which has led to the kind of teacher vacancy we have."

Skandera insisted that New Mexico's education policy is helping to expose poorly performing schools and turn them around.

"We have a school grading system that has been very powerful in helping parents identify effective schools, and helping school leaders identify strengths and weaknesses in their schools," she said. "It's important that every state - like New Mexico - has a plan to intervene in schools that are struggling. Making sure we know how our students are doing is absolutely a civil rights issue and we should own that across the nation."

New Mexico: Lujan Sponsors Measures to Overturn Citizens United and Increase Transparency in Elections

LENGTH: 410 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District announced today that he is supporting a pair of measures aimed at limiting money in politics by overturning the Citizens United Supreme Court decision and increasing transparency in elections. Luján is a cosponsor of the DISCLOSE Act and the Democracy for All Amendment, which would amend the Constitution.

"Five years ago, Citizens United opened up the floodgates of special-interest money into our political system. Since that time, we've seen the rise of Super PACs that can spend unlimited amounts of money while hiding their donors and preventing the American people from finding the truth behind where their money comes from," Congressman Luján said. "The legislation I am supporting would increase transparency in our electoral system and restore accountability, while ensuring that a wealthy few do not drown out the voices of the American people."

The DISCLOSE Act increases transparency through four major requirements:

o Enhances public reporting of campaign-related activity by corporations and other outside groups. All corporations, unions, other outside groups, and Super PACs will have to report to the FEC within 24 hours of making a $10,000 campaign expenditure or financial transfer to other groups which can then be used for campaign-related activity.
o Requires corporations and other outside groups to stand by their ads. All leaders of corporations, unions, other outside groups, and Super PACs that make campaign-related ads will have to stand by their ads and say that he or she "approves this message." Top financial contributors have to be disclosed in television and radio advertisements.
o Requires corporations and other outside groups to disclose campaign-related spending to shareholders and organization members.
o Requires lobbyists to disclose campaign-related expenditures in conjunction with their lobbying activities.

The Democracy for All Amendment amends the Constitution to provide Congress and the states with the authority to determine reasonable campaign finance regulations and distinguish between natural persons and corporations or other artificial entities. A companion bill has been introduced in the Senate by Senator Tom Udall of New Mexico.

New Mexico: New Mexico Lawmakers Announce $15.6 Million Expansion Funding for State Veterans' Home

LENGTH: 654 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

WASHINGTON - Today, U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham announced the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) has approved $15.6 million conditional funding for the New Mexico State Veterans' Home in Truth or Consequences to construct a new 59 bed facility. The construction and expansion project includes 39 Alzheimer's beds, a 20 bed Skilled Nursing Unit, a new rehabilitation section for inpatient and outpatient services, and a new pool. The N.M. State Veterans' Home must complete items the VA has outlined as requirements for final grant award approval within 180 days from the date they received notification of the conditional funding approval.

The conditionally awarded funding is available through the VA's State Home Construction Grant Program, which provides matching grant funds for renovation and construction of state veterans homes and adult day care facilities. The VA matches 65 percent of the project costs, and states fund the remaining 35 percent. The N.M. State Veterans' Home--the only nursing facility in N.M. dedicated specifically to serving veterans and their families--has planned the construction of a new facility since 2008, and the project is estimated to cost $30 million. It has already secured $12.5 million in state funding and plans to request additional funding during the 2015 state legislative session.

"The New Mexico State Veterans' Home provides top-notch nursing home care for our veterans, and this grant will help with needed updates and an expansion to help better serve elderly and rehabbing patients," Udall said. "As a member of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Military Construction and Veterans Affairs, I am proud to support funding for projects like this to ensure our veterans get the care they have earned. I thank our state legislature for setting aside initial funding for this project, and we ask that state lawmakers provide the full amount so construction can move forward."

"Constructing a new facility at the New Mexico State Veterans' Home will provide our elderly veterans with the best nursing care available," Heinrich said. "This funding ensures that veterans in New Mexico with rehabilitative or disability needs benefit from state-of-the-art inpatient and outpatient services, and a Skilled Nursing Unit. These kinds of investments are critical if we are to fulfill our nation's promise to those who served. Few sacrifices are as selfless as those our military service men and women make in defense of this nation. We owe our veterans and their loved ones more than a debt of gratitude -- we owe them action in both our words and deeds."

"As the one nursing facility in New Mexico that serves only our veterans and their families, the State Veterans' Home helps New Mexico's heroes that come from every corner of the state," Luján said. "Funds for an expansion will enable this important facility to assist more of our brave men and women and give them the care they have earned through their service to our nation. The VA's approval for conditional funding represents another important step toward making the new facility a reality for New Mexico's veterans."

"Veterans and their families deserve every opportunity for quality care and skilled nursing that will help them recover from injuries and live with dignity," Lujan Grisham said. "I fully support this investment and urge the VA to ensure that residents at the State Veterans' Home have access to quality programs and qualified staff."

The N.M. State Veterans' Home received notice of the conditional funding approval in late September, and therefore must meet the requirements outlined by the VA by late March for final approval of the $15,614,314 award.

REP. NANCY PELOSI, D-CALIF., HOUSE MINORITY LEADER, HOLDS A NEWS CONFERENCE AT HOUSE DEMOCRATIC ISSUES CONFERENCE

January 30, 2015 Friday

EVENT DATE: January 30, 2015

TYPE: NEWS CONFERENCE

LOCATION: PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

SPEAKER: REP. NANCY PELOSI, D-CALIF., HOUSE MINORITY LEADER,

WITNESSES:
REP. XAVIER BECERRA, D-CALIF., CHAIRMAN, HOUSE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS
REP. JOSEPH CROWLEY, D-N.Y., VICE CHAIRMAN, HOUSE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS
REP. CHRIS VAN HOLLEN, D-MD.
REP. DONNA EDWARDS, D-MD., CO-CHAIR, DEMOCRATIC STEERING AND POLICY COMMITTEE
REP. JAMES E. CLYBURN, D-S.C., ASSISTANT HOUSE MINORITY LEADER
REP. BEN RAY LUJAN, D-N.M.

TEXT:

BECERRA: So just to give you a warning, we have buses filled with members that are waiting for us, so we're going to all try to brief, take a couple of questions and we're going to scoot out so we can make sure it continues to be a great conference.

Shall we start? OK.

So let me thank you all for being here. Javier Xavier, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

The vice chairman will tell you right now, we just had a rousing finishing. Cleanup batter did a great job. The vice president -- our vice chairman, Mr. Crowley, will tell you about that.

But we knew why we were here. We came understanding the mission we were given by the American people. We had it in the title of our conference: Grow America's Economy, Grow American Paychecks.

That was what it was all about for us these last two and a half days, honing in what we need to do to make sure it's clear who the real job creators are: the middle-class. We know it's the middle class who go out there and generate demand, they're the ones that build the markets. The middle class drives our economy.

We understand and we choose to be Democrats, because we choose to be the party of the middle class, not the party of Koch.

We understand that there have to be solutions. We must strengthen not just the middle class with more jobs, higher wages, improving our roads, our bridges, our classrooms, our public safety. We have to do something more to make sure that more than 10 million Americans get health security.

So we leave Philly, the land and home of American democracy, united shoulder to shoulder with the middle class who want to dream even higher. We know that. They want to go beyond the middle class.

And we know we're here shoulder to shoulder with the aspiring class who dream of becoming part of the middle class, part of the job creators.

That's why we came, we know where we go from here, and now let me ask our vice chairman, Joe Crowley, to tell us a little bit more about the conference.

CROWLEY: As the vice chairman said, I was going to say, we had a rousing ending.

(LAUGHTER)

And I'm so pleased to be here today and to have had the opportunity to introduce the vice president before our caucus today.

I want to thank the president for his stirring speech last night as well, but there's -- there's really no better way to the conference -- caucus retreat than with Joe Biden. He just is wonderful.

I want to thank Xavier Becerra and all the caucus staff as well for a wonderful caucus retreat.

I want to thank the leader and all the members of the leadership as well on focusing the attention of our caucus and our party on growing our economy before the middle class, giving a leg up, giving a hand up to those who need it most, people who are struggling to get into the middle class and for people who are in the middle class today.

So I thank you all -- all the leadership and all the members of the Democratic Caucus.

And with that, I turn it now to the ranking member of the budget committee, Chris Van Hollen of Maryland.

VAN HOLLEN: And I -- I too want to thank our chairman and vice chairman of the caucus. It was a terrific gathering. I think we all leave here with a big boost to go into the next round. Thank you, Madam Leader and the whole team here.

And of course, on Monday, we're going to be hearing from the president in the form of his submission of the budget, which will build on his State of the Union address, and we'll quickly be into discussion on the budget, because both the House and the Senate under the rules have to come up with a budget by April 15th.

And those budgets at their root are really a discussion of and a debate about the values and priorities we have as a country. Where should we be investing? How do we move forward? How do we raise revenue?

How do we do all of that in a way that grows our economy as fast as possible, but also in a way that provides for greater shared prosperity? Because one of the things we've seen is as the job markets have picked up, as more and more people have gone back to work, we still have a real challenge with stagnant wages, especially for folks in the middle class and those working their way into the middle class.

So we're gonna be focused like a laser beam on those issues. The president's budget makes investments that are absolutely essential to help power our economy in education, in scientific research and innovation, in infrastructure, but also provides help to working families and middle-income families to help make ends meet. Things like his child and dependent care tax credit. Things like his two- earner tax credit.

So, we want to make sure that both the investments we make as well as the tax policy we build are designed, again, to rapidly grow our economy in a way that everybody can benefit.

And what we do know is if the past is prelude, and we expect it to be, our Republican colleagues will put forward a budget that takes us in the exact opposite direction. They will continue to focus on trickle-down economics, simply cutting tax rates for folks at the very top and thinking somehow miraculously that's gonna help everybody else, when history has told us that doesn't work.

And then they're gonna be dramatically cutting investments in our kids' education and in scientific research that helps power our economy and in infrastructure.

So, we welcome this debate. We think this is the question the country should be focused on.

If you listen to a lot of Republicans, they agree with us rhetorically on what the challenge is. Right? I mean, you hear Mitch McConnell and Speaker Boehner, they're talking for the first time about the middle class and wage stagnation.

Now, we welcome a debate about how you're gonna actually do that, because we think we have a plan and that the president has a plan to do that. We think the Republicans' plan actually takes the country in the wrong direction.

And, Donna Edwards, who has been somebody who, I should say, when it comes things like the child and dependent tax credit, has been championing this for a very long time.

So, Donna?

EDWARDS: Thank you very much, Chris.

And thank you to our chairman and vice chairman for a really fabulous conference about growing and building the momentum for moving the middle class forward.

But I'm here to talk to you today, actually, about a piece of unfinished business. And it is the unfinished business of the last Congress with a looming deadline of February 27 for 280,000 employees of the Department of Homeland Security, and for the security of the United States and our domestic security.

And that is the expiration of the funding for the Department of Homeland Security.

Like Chris Van Hollen, I represent a congressional district that is in the metropolitan Washington region where our law enforcement agencies cooperate and share cooperation for our domestic security and our homeland security, and they are depending on the Department of Homeland Security at a time of great international threat, daily threat, and daily threats to our homeland.

And the Republicans have decided that they want to have a food fight with the present of the United States because he took executive action on immigration when they failed to act on immigration.

And, right now, they want to hold hostage the funding for the Department of Homeland Security, and it's unacceptable.

And so, the unfinished business from last year -- the unfinished business of this Congress, the first order of business, before we can even get to these -- to these priorities, and we want to get to them, is to fund the Department of Homeland -- Homeland Security.

And I think the American people should know that it is at the feet of the Republican Party that our domestic security is in jeopardy.

And so, for all of those employees who on February 27th, they will be essential employees without a paycheck because of the Republican failure to act.

And so, as we go back to Washington, February 27th looms. And it's the responsibility of the House Republicans to get their act together and fund the Department of Homeland Security.

And so, with that, I'd like to turn this over to our leader who has taken charge over these last several days and is gonna lead middle-class momentum, Nancy Pelosi.

PELOSI: Thank you very much, Congresswoman Edwards.

Thank you, my colleagues.

I want to join in commending our distinguished chair of the caucus, Xavier Becerra and Vice Chair Joe Crowley for a great, great meeting. It's fraught (ph) with me a few days of -- of conversation -- is just the tip of the iceberg of the work that has gone into it, and what has gone into it has produced unity, camaraderie, enthusiasm but more importantly than that, momentum, momentum for the middle class, middle class, the true job creator.

And that is our message to the American people: The squeeze on the middle class is a squeeze on our economy. All of the economic indicators show that our economy is growing and prospects are good except one: the stagnation of wages for our working families.

Unless we can put purchasing powers -- power into the hands of the consumers in this consumer economy, we will not have recovery that we need, and that's why our focus has been on the middle class, the backbone of our democracy but also the job creators.

As we gather here in Philadelphia, where many of our sacred founding documents were written, they talked about life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That -- that was amazing, that in that time, they said "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

As you've heard me say before in the Affordable Care Act, we have given people the ability for a healthier life and the ability to pursue their happiness, because they were not job-locked and -- and they could make their own decisions freely.

But the fact is also that life, liberty and pursuit of happiness must be reflected in the values of our country in a budget. And I was very proud of the interaction -- it's only the beginning -- on the budget led by Congressman Van Hollen, to -- to be -- Ranking Member Van Hollen -- to be continued. This is just -- where we go from here, continued discussion on the budget, which will show the differentiation between the values that we think everyone shares in this country and the ill, misguided proposals the Republicans have in their budget.

So we go forward. Chris will be having -- Ranking Member Van Hollen will have those meetings with members about how we get consensus about -- around our budget and support of the principles on the president's budget.

Mr. Clyburn, as you know, is heading up our outreach and engagement task force to give people a reason to register, a reason to vote in this 50th anniversary of the Voting Rights Act.

Congresswoman Donna Edwards will be taking the lead on our campaign reform, trying to reduce the role of money in politics to increase the level of -- of hope and participation of many more people, all part of that empowerment.

And we're very proud of the role that Chairman -- I still call him Chairman -- Steve Israel...

(LAUGHTER)

Don't you dare.

Steve Israel is heading our -- our policy and communication group so that so that when we build this consensus within the party, everyone is, again, in harmony, in unity, in force on it.

Of course, our -- our chairman, Ben Ray Lujan, will be writing a political course, and we're very proud of the reaction the caucus has given to him.

So for us, it was a very successful weekend -- almost a weekend -- few days. We were so honored by the president's speech and the vice president speech as well.

Building on the momentum of the State of the Union address, reiterating -- returning to some of those principles and values and specific recommendations, building momentum for the middle class.

Thank you.

(UNKNOWN): We will take a couple questions.

QUESTION: Madam Leader, two-part question.

The first one, on behalf of my TV colleagues, your reaction to Mitt Romney (inaudible)...

PELOSI: Yeah, he's out of the race, right?

What else you got on your list?

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: So any reaction to Mitt Romney -- any reaction to Mitt Romney not running.

PELOSI: Let me say this. We have members waiting on the bus. I'm all packed, so I can stay a little bit later than the others.

But let's stay with our -- our...

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

PELOSI: I'll come -- I'll come -- I'm happy to come back to that, but let's give them the chance.

QUESTION: Then my question would be for you, understand last night when the president talked about trade promotional authority was met with some skepticism from your caucus.

Did you deliver the vote on that if need be (ph)?

PELOSI: Well, I -- I think that you -- I don't know -- I think -- people are -- as I have said over and over, let's try to find a path to yes.

I don't know if that's possible. It depends on what is in the trade -- in the TPP. You know, "Give us fast track for TPP," well, what's TPP? Tell us what that is.

I think people are open to listening, because we are a party of trade and we understand the global economy. On the other hand, I'll say what I said a couple days ago, we will make a judgment about what is in there as to how -- what impact it has on the wages of America's working families.

QUESTION: If I may ask one -- a hometown question, local media and local political leadership's obsessed with trying to get the '16 convention here.

PELOSI: (inaudible)

QUESTION: Thank you, ma'am.

(LAUGHTER)

PELOSI: Do you think that's why the mayor was here the whole time?

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Yes, it was.

PELOSI: (inaudible) to our issues conference.

(UNKNOWN): He was very good. He was great. Mayor Nutter's speech.

QUESTION: You mentioned Congressman Clyburn's leading up the effort on voter engagement. I know you spent a lot of this -- of this conference talking about the middle class -- talking about the middle class. How much have you talked in this conference about the voter engagement issue and the voting rights issue?

CLYBURN: We talked a great deal about it. In fact, we opened on Wednesday evening, the whole evening was about that. And we showed some clips from that earlier era -- not just to focus on the movie, "Selma," but to give our members, a lot of whom read about or heard about the movement, as a lot of people called it.

We did two clips -- one from a speech that Martin Luther King Jr. did in 1966, less than one year after the Voting Rights Act was signed into law, and another one from a speech he gave in 1967. Not coincidentally, both those speeches were in South Carolina -- to allow our members to see that in spite of what you may hear from the other side, Martin Luther King Jr. had a big focus on the ballot box and legislation. It was more than just about a dream unfulfilled, but he spoke about how that dream should be fulfilled.

And so, we are focusing a lot of attention on this. And I do believe that to build this middle-class economy, it is so critical to the future growth and development of this great country, we need to get more people engaged. And we're gonna very hard to do that.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLYBURN: Yes, we did. And we are going to build -- and we have a full task force. The task force has met already. And we'll meet at least twice this coming week to really get this ball moving. And they've all got great ideas on how they think we can get this done.

VAN HOLLEN (?): Other questions?

QUESTION: I want to ask a question about the way this retreat was run. At times for the reporters here, it seems like this has been like a police state. At your, the caucus's direction, staff has been extremely heavy-handed, following reporters to the bathroom, at times -- yes, that's -- actually, we have been escorted everywhere we've gone.

The Republicans don't operate like this. It's not like this when we follow you guys around the Capitol. So, why all the heavy handedness? Is it really necessary?

(CROSSTALK)

BECERRA: Yeah, I -- we're not aware that they were following -- we had to have security in the hotel that we were in, because it is expected by Capitol Police that we would be secured. This hotel, where the press was located, we did not have those kinds of requirements. If you want to give me some names of staff, I'll willing to take them, because...

(CROSSTALK)

BECERRA: ... they might be ready for the Capitol Police, to work for the Capitol Police.

QUESTION: They said they were operating under the direction of the caucus. And the Capitol Police said the same thing. So, it's just -- it's unlike any of the other retreats operate. And it really...

(CROSSTALK).

BECERRA: Get names. Get names, because that wasn't at the direction of the caucus.

(UNKNOWN): Chairman, they followed me into the bathroom too.

(LAUGHTER)

CLYBURN: Well, let me say this, because something came up at the breakfast this morning. As many of you know, I come from a less than middle-class background. I define middle-class aspirationally. I believe -- when I finished college and my wife I finished college, together we both made around $7,000 per year. But I thought I was in the middle class.

CLYBURN: So I'm very, very concerned about the wait staff. Now, a few of them came to me about some of this. And I said to them, look, you've got the president of the United States and the vice president of United States. You all read the headlines. You'll know exactly what kind of challenges the security of the first family is having."

And so we're not going to be able" -- because they wanted to come into the breakfast -- until people are vetted by their Social Security numbers and that sort of thing, we told them, "This is not what we would like, but this is what's going to be required."

So a lot of this had been going around, and they understood.

And so I think that we have the responsibility to -- to maintain the security that the Secret Service -- because I spoke with some of them -- were demanding.

(UNKNOWN): We can maybe take one last question.

QUESTION: Actually, this is for Chairman Lujan, who we haven't heard as much from in the last few days.

What have you told your colleagues about the 2016 cycle? How are you preparing, you know?

Whip Hoyer yesterday suggested there's a universe of 60 districts that, through various machinations, might be at play or will be competitive. Do you -- do you adhere to that strategy or -- you know, what's the message you're giving your colleagues?

LUJAN: Look, I -- I think that we're -- we were all clear, and maybe even Mr. Hoyer's quote was taken out of context.

There's excitement within our colleagues, and you heard it yesterday. To feel that energy and to be able to talk to my colleagues over the hours that followed the presentations last night into today, this morning, pats on the back, saying, "Ben, we're with you. We're ready to go. We're going to do whatever we need to do."

There's -- there's excitement there, and there's member engagement. You're seeing members step forward now that maybe there was -- something happened in the past, but they're all.

They said, "Look, we've turned a page. We're going forward. We don't like being in the minority."

And the path that we laid out was pretty simple. It was majority math. We know Republicans are overextended.

We look at the maps where the president won with strong numbers where Republicans hold those seats. Even at the Senate, they're going to be defending 20-plus seats.

So we're going forward. And they're having a messaging nightmare.

Look at Governor Romney. I mean, one of the questions that comes in is asking about President Romney's reaction to him. I think Republicans are happier that he's not running than anyone else in the country.

As we talk about where our priorities have to be, with the middle class.

Charlie Dent, week one, week two, week three, week four. Week four brought us -- it's not the end of the world to be able to put the Homeland Security Department and the funding for our nation's security and the economic strength that comes with our ports, that comes with that.

What's going to come in week five? Let's look at that together.

So look, we're strong. We're coming out of this around a unified message. It's middle-class economics. To me, that means being able to put a roof over your head. It means being able to have bread and milk and eggs in your refrigerator, maybe put a little money into the bank, make sure your kids can go to college and look after them.

You know, that's what we're talking about. And where I come from, those are the people creating jobs, putting people to work. That's where we are all committed. Every one of our members, if you go talk to them -- and I challenge you to -- we are all about strengthening working families in the middle class all across America.

So I have -- I'm excited about this. When I get a chance to talk about it, let's go, because sleeves are going to be rolled up. We're going to get to work here.

So we're going to see -- feel that same excitement from all of our colleagues, and that's what I got coming into this. I'm -- I'm more energized than I am now than I was coming into this retreat.

PELOSI: Mr. -- Mr. Crowley would like to answer your question about the convention.

(LAUGHTER)

CROWLEY: I want to thank -- I'd like to thank the mayor for the welcome that he's given to us, to this incredibly important city to the United States. We really have had an incredibly warm welcome.

And -- and Madam Leader, I look forward to welcoming the mayor and the entire Pennsylvania delegation to New York for the 2016 convention.

Thank you all very much.

PELOSI: And then Congresswoman Beatty, who was also on the trip from Columbus, she would have something to say.

No, we were very honored by the presence of the mayor. He's always an intellectual resource to us in terms of policy and organizing and actually perhaps -- I don't know if you saw his speech the other day -- he talked about infrastructure and thanked us for what we did in -- in the -- in the early time in the (inaudible).

But the fact is he came to Washington and advocated for that in a very, very positive way and got results from it.

So I mean, what a wonderful city for many purposes, and this convention, this meeting certainly went off very well, so that's good.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

PELOSI: Yeah. Well, you know, I don't -- the DNC makes the decision.

QUESTION: May the most appropriate city win.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

PELOSI: He probably concluded the prospect of success was not there, despite the thought that he was gonna win on election night. Look, they're a lovely family, he's a wonderful American. He's been a governor. He's served our country in many ways.

I don't want to make a joke about his candidacy, but I don't -- I don't think that -- I said he was the preferred candidate, so that tells you how much strength I thought he would have in the general election.

Thank you all very much again.

I just want to go back to one point that you mentioned about voting rights and the civil rights, and that aspect of this meeting. I just want to say that I did the close as we presented, Mr. Van Hollen did too, to say where we go from here, discussing budget priorities and how we arrive at them.

But I started my remarks by quoting Dr. King saying that he wanted his children to be judged not by the color of their skin, but by the content of their character. And I thought that that should be -- that sentence by Dr. King -- he taught us so much, but to listen to that -- judge -- judge -- he used the word "judge" -- by the content of their character.

And, how do we, as a country, address the content of the character of our children when we have their parents not making enough money to put food on the table, to have two jobs so they don't have any time to mentor them. That if they get sick, they don't have one paid sick leave, a day of sick leave to care for their children. That housing is a situation that really causes some psychological problems for children when it is in doubt or not adequate.

The opportunity gap that we have in our country, in order to address it, we have to address the education gap and what is happening. And 40 million children are going to be on the other side of the -- of the digital divide if we do not have the right budget priorities to address education, and the right policies in the budget that address enabling families to have the time to mentor their children, to nurture their children.

What is the character -- the content of the character of a nation that does not encourage the nurturing of children in its policies?

And I think that, again, Dr. King's words were probably very -- while we think of them -- we've heard them so many times, but taken one at a time -- judge. We will be judged by the decisions we make to meet the needs of our children, all of America's children, who are the heirs to America's future.

So it was very much a part of our values that we discussed and our plans for how we go forward.

Thank you all for participating, and see you next time.

Bye-bye.

REP. NANCY PELOSI, D-CALIF., HOUSE MINORITY LEADER, HOLDS A NEWS CONFERENCE AT HOUSE DEMOCRATIC ISSUES CONFERENCE

January 30, 2015 Friday

EVENT DATE: January 30, 2015

TYPE: NEWS CONFERENCE

LOCATION: PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

SPEAKER: REP. NANCY PELOSI, D-CALIF., HOUSE MINORITY LEADER,

WITNESSES:
REP. XAVIER BECERRA, D-CALIF., CHAIRMAN, HOUSE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS
REP. JOSEPH CROWLEY, D-N.Y., VICE CHAIRMAN, HOUSE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS
REP. CHRIS VAN HOLLEN, D-MD.
REP. DONNA EDWARDS, D-MD., CO-CHAIR, DEMOCRATIC STEERING AND POLICY COMMITTEE
REP. JAMES E. CLYBURN, D-S.C., ASSISTANT HOUSE MINORITY LEADER
REP. BEN RAY LUJAN, D-N.M.

TEXT:

BECERRA: So just to give you a warning, we have buses filled with members that are waiting for us, so we're going to all try to brief, take a couple of questions and we're going to scoot out so we can make sure it continues to be a great conference.

Shall we start? OK.

So let me thank you all for being here. Javier Xavier, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

The vice chairman will tell you right now, we just had a rousing finishing. Cleanup batter did a great job. The vice president -- our vice chairman, Mr. Crowley, will tell you about that.

But we knew why we were here. We came understanding the mission we were given by the American people. We had it in the title of our conference: Grow America's Economy, Grow American Paychecks.

That was what it was all about for us these last two and a half days, honing in what we need to do to make sure it's clear who the real job creators are: the middle-class. We know it's the middle class who go out there and generate demand, they're the ones that build the markets. The middle class drives our economy.

We understand and we choose to be Democrats, because we choose to be the party of the middle class, not the party of Koch.

We understand that there have to be solutions. We must strengthen not just the middle class with more jobs, higher wages, improving our roads, our bridges, our classrooms, our public safety. We have to do something more to make sure that more than 10 million Americans get health security.

So we leave Philly, the land and home of American democracy, united shoulder to shoulder with the middle class who want to dream even higher. We know that. They want to go beyond the middle class.

And we know we're here shoulder to shoulder with the aspiring class who dream of becoming part of the middle class, part of the job creators.

That's why we came, we know where we go from here, and now let me ask our vice chairman, Joe Crowley, to tell us a little bit more about the conference.

CROWLEY: As the vice chairman said, I was going to say, we had a rousing ending.

(LAUGHTER)

And I'm so pleased to be here today and to have had the opportunity to introduce the vice president before our caucus today.

I want to thank the president for his stirring speech last night as well, but there's -- there's really no better way to the conference -- caucus retreat than with Joe Biden. He just is wonderful.

I want to thank Xavier Becerra and all the caucus staff as well for a wonderful caucus retreat.

I want to thank the leader and all the members of the leadership as well on focusing the attention of our caucus and our party on growing our economy before the middle class, giving a leg up, giving a hand up to those who need it most, people who are struggling to get into the middle class and for people who are in the middle class today.

So I thank you all -- all the leadership and all the members of the Democratic Caucus.

And with that, I turn it now to the ranking member of the budget committee, Chris Van Hollen of Maryland.

VAN HOLLEN: And I -- I too want to thank our chairman and vice chairman of the caucus. It was a terrific gathering. I think we all leave here with a big boost to go into the next round. Thank you, Madam Leader and the whole team here.

And of course, on Monday, we're going to be hearing from the president in the form of his submission of the budget, which will build on his State of the Union address, and we'll quickly be into discussion on the budget, because both the House and the Senate under the rules have to come up with a budget by April 15th.

And those budgets at their root are really a discussion of and a debate about the values and priorities we have as a country. Where should we be investing? How do we move forward? How do we raise revenue?

How do we do all of that in a way that grows our economy as fast as possible, but also in a way that provides for greater shared prosperity? Because one of the things we've seen is as the job markets have picked up, as more and more people have gone back to work, we still have a real challenge with stagnant wages, especially for folks in the middle class and those working their way into the middle class.

So we're gonna be focused like a laser beam on those issues. The president's budget makes investments that are absolutely essential to help power our economy in education, in scientific research and innovation, in infrastructure, but also provides help to working families and middle-income families to help make ends meet. Things like his child and dependent care tax credit. Things like his two- earner tax credit.

So, we want to make sure that both the investments we make as well as the tax policy we build are designed, again, to rapidly grow our economy in a way that everybody can benefit.

And what we do know is if the past is prelude, and we expect it to be, our Republican colleagues will put forward a budget that takes us in the exact opposite direction. They will continue to focus on trickle-down economics, simply cutting tax rates for folks at the very top and thinking somehow miraculously that's gonna help everybody else, when history has told us that doesn't work.

And then they're gonna be dramatically cutting investments in our kids' education and in scientific research that helps power our economy and in infrastructure.

So, we welcome this debate. We think this is the question the country should be focused on.

If you listen to a lot of Republicans, they agree with us rhetorically on what the challenge is. Right? I mean, you hear Mitch McConnell and Speaker Boehner, they're talking for the first time about the middle class and wage stagnation.

Now, we welcome a debate about how you're gonna actually do that, because we think we have a plan and that the president has a plan to do that. We think the Republicans' plan actually takes the country in the wrong direction.

And, Donna Edwards, who has been somebody who, I should say, when it comes things like the child and dependent tax credit, has been championing this for a very long time.

So, Donna?

EDWARDS: Thank you very much, Chris.

And thank you to our chairman and vice chairman for a really fabulous conference about growing and building the momentum for moving the middle class forward.

But I'm here to talk to you today, actually, about a piece of unfinished business. And it is the unfinished business of the last Congress with a looming deadline of February 27 for 280,000 employees of the Department of Homeland Security, and for the security of the United States and our domestic security.

How much have you talked in this conference about the voter engagement issue and the voting rights issue?

CLYBURN: We talked a great deal about it. In fact, we opened on Wednesday evening, the whole evening was about that. And we showed some clips from that earlier era -- not just to focus on the movie, "Selma," but to give our members, a lot of whom read about or heard about the movement, as a lot of people called it.

We did two clips -- one from a speech that Martin Luther King Jr. did in 1966, less than one year after the Voting Rights Act was signed into law, and another one from a speech he gave in 1967. Not coincidentally, both those speeches were in South Carolina -- to allow our members to see that in spite of what you may hear from the other side, Martin Luther King Jr. had a big focus on the ballot box and legislation. It was more than just about a dream unfulfilled, but he spoke about how that dream should be fulfilled.

And so, we are focusing a lot of attention on this. And I do believe that to build this middle-class economy, it is so critical to the future growth and development of this great country, we need to get more people engaged. And we're gonna very hard to do that.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLYBURN: Yes, we did. And we are going to build -- and we have a full task force. The task force has met already. And we'll meet at least twice this coming week to really get this ball moving. And they've all got great ideas on how they think we can get this done.

VAN HOLLEN (?): Other questions?

QUESTION: I want to ask a question about the way this retreat was run. At times for the reporters here, it seems like this has been like a police state. At your, the caucus's direction, staff has been extremely heavy-handed, following reporters to the bathroom, at times -- yes, that's -- actually, we have been escorted everywhere we've gone.

The Republicans don't operate like this. It's not like this when we follow you guys around the Capitol. So, why all the heavy handedness? Is it really necessary?

(CROSSTALK)

BECERRA: Yeah, I -- we're not aware that they were following -- we had to have security in the hotel that we were in, because it is expected by Capitol Police that we would be secured. This hotel, where the press was located, we did not have those kinds of requirements. If you want to give me some names of staff, I'll willing to take them, because...

(CROSSTALK)

BECERRA: ... they might be ready for the Capitol Police, to work for the Capitol Police.

QUESTION: They said they were operating under the direction of the caucus. And the Capitol Police said the same thing. So, it's just -- it's unlike any of the other retreats operate. And it really...

(CROSSTALK).

BECERRA: Get names. Get names, because that wasn't at the direction of the caucus.

(UNKNOWN): Chairman, they followed me into the bathroom too.

(LAUGHTER)

CLYBURN: Well, let me say this, because something came up at the breakfast this morning. As many of you know, I come from a less than middle-class background. I define middle-class aspirationally. I believe -- when I finished college and my wife I finished college, together we both made around $7,000 per year. But I thought I was in the middle class.

CLYBURN: So I'm very, very concerned about the wait staff. Now, a few of them came to me about some of this. And I said to them, look, you've got the president of the United States and the vice president of United States. You all read the headlines. You'll know exactly what kind of challenges the security of the first family is having."

And so we're not going to be able" -- because they wanted to come into the breakfast -- until people are vetted by their Social Security numbers and that sort of thing, we told them, "This is not what we would like, but this is what's going to be required."

So a lot of this had been going around, and they understood.

And so I think that we have the responsibility to -- to maintain the security that the Secret Service -- because I spoke with some of them -- were demanding.

(UNKNOWN): We can maybe take one last question.

QUESTION: Actually, this is for Chairman Lujan, who we haven't heard as much from in the last few days.

What have you told your colleagues about the 2016 cycle? How are you preparing, you know?

Whip Hoyer yesterday suggested there's a universe of 60 districts that, through various machinations, might be at play or will be competitive. Do you -- do you adhere to that strategy or -- you know, what's the message you're giving your colleagues?

LUJAN: Look, I -- I think that we're -- we were all clear, and maybe even Mr. Hoyer's quote was taken out of context.

There's excitement within our colleagues, and you heard it yesterday. To feel that energy and to be able to talk to my colleagues over the hours that followed the presentations last night into today, this morning, pats on the back, saying, "Ben, we're with you. We're ready to go. We're going to do whatever we need to do."

There's -- there's excitement there, and there's member engagement. You're seeing members step forward now that maybe there was -- something happened in the past, but they're all.

They said, "Look, we've turned a page. We're going forward. We don't like being in the minority."

And the path that we laid out was pretty simple. It was majority math. We know Republicans are overextended.

We look at the maps where the president won with strong numbers where Republicans hold those seats. Even at the Senate, they're going to be defending 20-plus seats.

So we're going forward. And they're having a messaging nightmare.

Look at Governor Romney. I mean, one of the questions that comes in is asking about President Romney's reaction to him. I think Republicans are happier that he's not running than anyone else in the country.

As we talk about where our priorities have to be, with the middle class.

Charlie Dent, week one, week two, week three, week four. Week four brought us -- it's not the end of the world to be able to put the Homeland Security Department and the funding for our nation's security and the economic strength that comes with our ports, that comes with that.

What's going to come in week five? Let's look at that together.

So look, we're strong. We're coming out of this around a unified message. It's middle-class economics. To me, that means being able to put a roof over your head. It means being able to have bread and milk and eggs in your refrigerator, maybe put a little money into the bank, make sure your kids can go to college and look after them.

You know, that's what we're talking about. And where I come from, those are the people creating jobs, putting people to work. That's where we are all committed. Every one of our members, if you go talk to them -- and I challenge you to -- we are all about strengthening working families in the middle class all across America.

So I have -- I'm excited about this. When I get a chance to talk about it, let's go, because sleeves are going to be rolled up. We're going to get to work here.

So we're going to see -- feel that same excitement from all of our colleagues, and that's what I got coming into this. I'm -- I'm more energized than I am now than I was coming into this retreat.

PELOSI: Mr. -- Mr. Crowley would like to answer your question about the convention.

(LAUGHTER)

CROWLEY: I want to thank -- I'd like to thank the mayor for the welcome that he's given to us, to this incredibly important city to the United States. We really have had an incredibly warm welcome.

And -- and Madam Leader, I look forward to welcoming the mayor and the entire Pennsylvania delegation to New York for the 2016 convention.

Thank you all very much.

PELOSI: And then Congresswoman Beatty, who was also on the trip from Columbus, she would have something to say.

No, we were very honored by the presence of the mayor. He's always an intellectual resource to us in terms of policy and organizing and actually perhaps -- I don't know if you saw his speech the other day -- he talked about infrastructure and thanked us for what we did in -- in the -- in the early time in the (inaudible).

But the fact is he came to Washington and advocated for that in a very, very positive way and got results from it.

So I mean, what a wonderful city for many purposes, and this convention, this meeting certainly went off very well, so that's good.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

PELOSI: Yeah. Well, you know, I don't -- the DNC makes the decision.

QUESTION: May the most appropriate city win.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

PELOSI: He probably concluded the prospect of success was not there, despite the thought that he was gonna win on election night. Look, they're a lovely family, he's a wonderful American. He's been a governor. He's served our country in many ways.

I don't want to make a joke about his candidacy, but I don't -- I don't think that -- I said he was the preferred candidate, so that tells you how much strength I thought he would have in the general election.

Thank you all very much again.

I just want to go back to one point that you mentioned about voting rights and the civil rights, and that aspect of this meeting. I just want to say that I did the close as we presented, Mr. Van Hollen did too, to say where we go from here, discussing budget priorities and how we arrive at them.

But I started my remarks by quoting Dr. King saying that he wanted his children to be judged not by the color of their skin, but by the content of their character. And I thought that that should be -- that sentence by Dr. King -- he taught us so much, but to listen to that -- judge -- judge -- he used the word "judge" -- by the content of their character.

And, how do we, as a country, address the content of the character of our children when we have their parents not making enough money to put food on the table, to have two jobs so they don't have any time to mentor them. That if they get sick, they don't have one paid sick leave, a day of sick leave to care for their children. That housing is a situation that really causes some psychological problems for children when it is in doubt or not adequate.

The opportunity gap that we have in our country, in order to address it, we have to address the education gap and what is happening. And 40 million children are going to be on the other side of the -- of the digital divide if we do not have the right budget priorities to address education, and the right policies in the budget that address enabling families to have the time to mentor their children, to nurture their children.

What is the character -- the content of the character of a nation that does not encourage the nurturing of children in its policies?

And I think that, again, Dr. King's words were probably very -- while we think of them -- we've heard them so many times, but taken one at a time -- judge. We will be judged by the decisions we make to meet the needs of our children, all of America's children, who are the heirs to America's future.

So it was very much a part of our values that we discussed and our plans for how we go forward.

Thank you all for participating, and see you next time.

Bye-bye.

HOUSE DEMOCRATS HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE AT THE HOUSE DEMOCRATIC ISSUES CONFERENCE, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

JANUARY 30, 2015

SPEAKERS: REP. NANCY PELOSI, D-CALIF., HOUSE MINORITY LEADER

REP. JAMES E. CLYBURN, D-S.C., ASSISTANT HOUSE MINORITY LEADER

REP. XAVIER BECERRA, D-CALIF., CHAIRMAN, HOUSE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS

REP. JOSEPH CROWLEY, D-N.Y., VICE CHAIRMAN, HOUSE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS

REP. DONNA EDWARDS, D-MD., CO-CHAIR, DEMOCRATIC STEERING AND POLICY COMMITTEE

REP. CHRIS VAN HOLLEN, D-MD.

REP. BEN RAY LUJAN, D-N.M.

[*] BECERRA: So just to give you a warning, we have buses filled with members that are waiting for us, so we're going to all try to brief, take a couple of questions and we're going to scoot out so we can make sure it continues to be a great conference.

Shall we start? OK.

So let me thank you all for being here. Javier Xavier, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

The vice chairman will tell you right now, we just had a rousing finishing. Cleanup batter did a great job. The vice president -- our vice chairman, Mr. Crowley, will tell you about that.

But we knew why we were here. We came understanding the mission we were given by the American people. We had it in the title of our conference: Grow America's Economy, Grow American Paychecks.

That was what it was all about for us these last two and a half days, honing in what we need to do to make sure it's clear who the real job creators are: the middle-class. We know it's the middle class who go out there and generate demand, they're the ones that build the markets. The middle class drives our economy.

We understand and we choose to be Democrats, because we choose to be the party of the middle class, not the party of Koch.

We understand that there have to be solutions. We must strengthen not just the middle class with more jobs, higher wages, improving our roads, our bridges, our classrooms, our public safety. We have to do something more to make sure that more than 10 million Americans get health security.

So we leave Philly, the land and home of American democracy, united shoulder to shoulder with the middle class who want to dream even higher. We know that. They want to go beyond the middle class.

And we know we're here shoulder to shoulder with the aspiring class who dream of becoming part of the middle class, part of the job creators.

That's why we came, we know where we go from here, and now let me ask our vice chairman, Joe Crowley, to tell us a little bit more about the conference.

CROWLEY: As the vice chairman said, I was going to say, we had a rousing ending.

(LAUGHTER)

And I'm so pleased to be here today and to have had the opportunity to introduce the vice president before our caucus today.

I want to thank the president for his stirring speech last night as well, but there's -- there's really no better way to the conference -- caucus retreat than with Joe Biden. He just is wonderful.

I want to thank Xavier Becerra and all the caucus staff as well for a wonderful caucus retreat.

I want to thank the leader and all the members of the leadership as well on focusing the attention of our caucus and our party on growing our economy before the middle class, giving a leg up, giving a hand up to those who need it most, people who are struggling to get into the middle class and for people who are in the middle class today.

So I thank you all -- all the leadership and all the members of the Democratic Caucus.

And with that, I turn it now to the ranking member of the budget committee, Chris Van Hollen of Maryland.

VAN HOLLEN: And I -- I too want to thank our chairman and vice chairman of the caucus. It was a terrific gathering. I think we all leave here with a big boost to go into the next round. Thank you, Madam Leader and the whole team here.

And of course, on Monday, we're going to be hearing from the president in the form of his submission of the budget, which will build on his State of the Union address, and we'll quickly be into discussion on the budget, because both the House and the Senate under the rules have to come up with a budget by April 15th.

And those budgets at their root are really a discussion of and a debate about the values and priorities we have as a country. Where should we be investing? How do we move forward? How do we raise revenue?

How do we do all of that in a way that grows our economy as fast as possible, but also in a way that provides for greater shared prosperity? Because one of the things we've seen is as the job markets have picked up, as more and more people have gone back to work, we still have a real challenge with stagnant wages, especially for folks in the middle class and those working their way into the middle class.

So we're gonna be focused like a laser beam on those issues. The president's budget makes investments that are absolutely essential to help power our economy in education, in scientific research and innovation, in infrastructure, but also provides help to working families and middle-income families to help make ends meet. Things like his child and dependent care tax credit. Things like his two- earner tax credit.

So, we want to make sure that both the investments we make as well as the tax policy we build are designed, again, to rapidly grow our economy in a way that everybody can benefit.

And what we do know is if the past is prelude, and we expect it to be, our Republican colleagues will put forward a budget that takes us in the exact opposite direction. They will continue to focus on trickle-down economics, simply cutting tax rates for folks at the very top and thinking somehow miraculously that's gonna help everybody else, when history has told us that doesn't work.

And then they're gonna be dramatically cutting investments in our kids' education and in scientific research that helps power our economy and in infrastructure. So, we welcome this debate. We think this is the question the country should be focused on.

If you listen to a lot of Republicans, they agree with us rhetorically on what the challenge is. Right? I mean, you hear Mitch McConnell and Speaker Boehner, they're talking for the first time about the middle class and wage stagnation.

Now, we welcome a debate about how you're gonna actually do that, because we think we have a plan and that the president has a plan to do that. We think the Republicans' plan actually takes the country in the wrong direction.

And, Donna Edwards, who has been somebody who, I should say, when it comes things like the child and dependent tax credit, has been championing this for a very long time.

So, Donna?

EDWARDS: Thank you very much, Chris.

And thank you to our chairman and vice chairman for a really fabulous conference about growing and building the momentum for moving the middle class forward.

But I'm here to talk to you today, actually, about a piece of unfinished business. And it is the unfinished business of the last Congress with a looming deadline of February 27 for 280,000 employees of the Department of Homeland Security, and for the security of the United States and our domestic security.

And that is the expiration of the funding for the Department of Homeland Security.

Like Chris Van Hollen, I represent a congressional district that is in the metropolitan Washington region where our law enforcement agencies cooperate and share cooperation for our domestic security and our homeland security, and they are depending on the Department of Homeland Security at a time of great international threat, daily threat, and daily threats to our homeland.

And the Republicans have decided that they want to have a food fight with the present of the United States because he took executive action on immigration when they failed to act on immigration.

And, right now, they want to hold hostage the funding for the Department of Homeland Security, and it's unacceptable.

And so, the unfinished business from last year -- the unfinished business of this Congress, the first order of business, before we can even get to these -- to these priorities, and we want to get to them, is to fund the Department of Homeland -- Homeland Security.

And I think the American people should know that it is at the feet of the Republican Party that our domestic security is in jeopardy. And so, for all of those employees who on February 27th, they will be essential employees without a paycheck because of the Republican failure to act.

And so, as we go back to Washington, February 27th looms. And it's the responsibility of the House Republicans to get their act together and fund the Department of Homeland Security.

And so, with that, I'd like to turn this over to our leader who has taken charge over these last several days and is gonna lead middle-class momentum, Nancy Pelosi.

PELOSI: Thank you very much, Congresswoman Edwards.

Thank you, my colleagues.

I want to join in commending our distinguished chair of the caucus, Xavier Becerra and Vice Chair Joe Crowley for a great, great meeting. It's fraught (ph) with me a few days of -- of conversation -- is just the tip of the iceberg of the work that has gone into it, and what has gone into it has produced unity, camaraderie, enthusiasm but more importantly than that, momentum, momentum for the middle class, middle class, the true job creator.

And that is our message to the American people: The squeeze on the middle class is a squeeze on our economy. All of the economic indicators show that our economy is growing and prospects are good except one: the stagnation of wages for our working families.

Unless we can put purchasing powers -- power into the hands of the consumers in this consumer economy, we will not have recovery that we need, and that's why our focus has been on the middle class, the backbone of our democracy but also the job creators.

As we gather here in Philadelphia, where many of our sacred founding documents were written, they talked about life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That -- that was amazing, that in that time, they said "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

As you've heard me say before in the Affordable Care Act, we have given people the ability for a healthier life and the ability to pursue their happiness, because they were not job-locked and -- and they could make their own decisions freely.

But the fact is also that life, liberty and pursuit of happiness must be reflected in the values of our country in a budget. And I was very proud of the interaction -- it's only the beginning -- on the budget led by Congressman Van Hollen, to -- to be -- Ranking Member Van Hollen -- to be continued. This is just -- where we go from here, continued discussion on the budget, which will show the differentiation between the values that we think everyone shares in this country and the ill, misguided proposals the Republicans have in their budget.

So we go forward. Chris will be having -- Ranking Member Van Hollen will have those meetings with members about how we get consensus about -- around our budget and support of the principles on the president's budget. Mr. Clyburn, as you know, is heading up our outreach and engagement task force to give people a reason to register, a reason to vote in this 50th anniversary of the Voting Rights Act.

Congresswoman Donna Edwards will be taking the lead on our campaign reform, trying to reduce the role of money in politics to increase the level of -- of hope and participation of many more people, all part of that empowerment.

And we're very proud of the role that Chairman -- I still call him Chairman -- Steve Israel...

(LAUGHTER)

Don't you dare.

Steve Israel is heading our -- our policy and communication group so that so that when we build this consensus within the party, everyone is, again, in harmony, in unity, in force on it.

Of course, our -- our chairman, Ben Ray Lujan, will be writing a political course, and we're very proud of the reaction the caucus has given to him.

So for us, it was a very successful weekend -- almost a weekend -- few days. We were so honored by the president's speech and the vice president speech as well.

Building on the momentum of the State of the Union address, reiterating -- returning to some of those principles and values and specific recommendations, building momentum for the middle class.

Thank you.

(UNKNOWN): We will take a couple questions.

QUESTION: Madam Leader, two-part question.

The first one, on behalf of my TV colleagues, your reaction to Mitt Romney (inaudible)...

PELOSI: Yeah, he's out of the race, right?

What else you got on your list?

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: So any reaction to Mitt Romney -- any reaction to Mitt Romney not running.

PELOSI: Let me say this. We have members waiting on the bus. I'm all packed, so I can stay a little bit later than the others.

But let's stay with our -- our...

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) PELOSI: I'll come -- I'll come -- I'm happy to come back to that, but let's give them the chance.

QUESTION: Then my question would be for you, understand last night when the president talked about trade promotional authority was met with some skepticism from your caucus.

Did you deliver the vote on that if need be (ph)?

PELOSI: Well, I -- I think that you -- I don't know -- I think -- people are -- as I have said over and over, let's try to find a path to yes.

I don't know if that's possible. It depends on what is in the trade -- in the TPP. You know, "Give us fast track for TPP," well, what's TPP? Tell us what that is.

I think people are open to listening, because we are a party of trade and we understand the global economy. On the other hand, I'll say what I said a couple days ago, we will make a judgment about what is in there as to how -- what impact it has on the wages of America's working families.

QUESTION: If I may ask one -- a hometown question, local media and local political leadership's obsessed with trying to get the '16 convention here.

PELOSI: (inaudible)

QUESTION: Thank you, ma'am.

(LAUGHTER)

PELOSI: Do you think that's why the mayor was here the whole time?

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Yes, it was.

PELOSI: (inaudible) to our issues conference.

(UNKNOWN): He was very good. He was great. Mayor Nutter's speech.

QUESTION: You mentioned Congressman Clyburn's leading up the effort on voter engagement. I know you spent a lot of this -- of this conference talking about the middle class -- talking about the middle class. How much have you talked in this conference about the voter engagement issue and the voting rights issue?

CLYBURN: We talked a great deal about it. In fact, we opened on Wednesday evening, the whole evening was about that. And -- and Madam Leader, I look forward to welcoming the mayor and the entire Pennsylvania delegation to New York for the 2016 convention.

Thank you all very much.

PELOSI: And then Congresswoman Beatty, who was also on the trip from Columbus, she would have something to say.

No, we were very honored by the presence of the mayor. He's always an intellectual resource to us in terms of policy and organizing and actually perhaps -- I don't know if you saw his speech the other day -- he talked about infrastructure and thanked us for what we did in -- in the -- in the early time in the (inaudible).

But the fact is he came to Washington and advocated for that in a very, very positive way and got results from it.

So I mean, what a wonderful city for many purposes, and this convention, this meeting certainly went off very well, so that's good.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

PELOSI: Yeah. Well, you know, I don't -- the DNC makes the decision.

QUESTION: May the most appropriate city win.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

PELOSI: He probably concluded the prospect of success was not there, despite the thought that he was gonna win on election night. Look, they're a lovely family, he's a wonderful American. He's been a governor. He's served our country in many ways.

I don't want to make a joke about his candidacy, but I don't -- I don't think that -- I said he was the preferred candidate, so that tells you how much strength I thought he would have in the general election.

Thank you all very much again.

I just want to go back to one point that you mentioned about voting rights and the civil rights, and that aspect of this meeting. I just want to say that I did the close as we presented, Mr. Van Hollen did too, to say where we go from here, discussing budget priorities and how we arrive at them.

But I started my remarks by quoting Dr. King saying that he wanted his children to be judged not by the color of their skin, but by the content of their character. And I thought that that should be -- that sentence by Dr. King -- he taught us so much, but to listen to that -- judge -- judge -- he used the word "judge" -- by the content of their character.

And, how do we, as a country, address the content of the character of our children when we have their parents not making enough money to put food on the table, to have two jobs so they don't have any time to mentor them. That if they get sick, they don't have one paid sick leave, a day of sick leave to care for their children. That housing is a situation that really causes some psychological problems for children when it is in doubt or not adequate.

The opportunity gap that we have in our country, in order to address it, we have to address the education gap and what is happening. And 40 million children are going to be on the other side of the -- of the digital divide if we do not have the right budget priorities to address education, and the right policies in the budget that address enabling families to have the time to mentor their children, to nurture their children.

What is the character -- the content of the character of a nation that does not encourage the nurturing of children in its policies?

And I think that, again, Dr. King's words were probably very -- while we think of them -- we've heard them so many times, but taken one at a time -- judge. We will be judged by the decisions we make to meet the needs of our children, all of America's children, who are the heirs to America's future.

So it was very much a part of our values that we discussed and our plans for how we go forward.

Thank you all for participating, and see you next time.

Bye-bye.

TRANSCRIPT OF PELOSI, HOUSE DEMOCRATIC LEADERS PRESS CONFERENCE TODAY CONCLUDING THE DEMOCRATIC ISSUES CONFERENCE JANUARY 30, 2015

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 2836 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi:

Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, Assistant Democratic Leader James Clyburn (D-SC), House Democratic Caucus Chairman Xavier Becerra (D-CA), Democratic Caucus Vice Chairman Joe Crowley (D-NY), Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Ben Ray Lujan (D-NM), Congressman Steve Israel (D-NY), Congressman Chris Van Hollen (D-MD) and Congresswoman Donna Edwards (D-MD) held a press conference today concluding the "Grow America's Economy, Grow American Paychecks" Democratic Issues Conference. Below is a transcript of Leader Pelosi's opening remarks and the question and answer session.

Leader Pelosi's opening remarks:

"Thank you very much, Congresswoman Edwards. Thank you, my colleagues. I want to join in commending our distinguished Chair of the Caucus Xavier Becerra and Vice Chair Joe Crowley for a great, great meeting. A few days of conversation is just the tip of the iceberg of the work that has gone into it. What has gone into it has produced unity, camaraderie, enthusiasm - but more important than that, momentum, momentum for the middle class.

"The middle class: the true job creator. That is our message to the American people. The squeeze on the middle class is a squeeze on our economy. All of the economic indicators show that our economy is growing, and prospects are good, except one - the stagnation of wages for our working families. Unless we can put purchasing power into the hands of the consumers in this consumer economy, we will not have the recovery that we need. That is why our focus has been on the middle class - the backbone of our democracy, but also the job creators.

"As we gather here in Philadelphia, where many of our sacred founding documents were written - they talked about life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That was amazing, that in that time, they said "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." You have heard me say before [that] in the Affordable Care Act we have given people the opportunity for a healthier life, and the ability to pursue their happiness, because they are not job locked and they could make their own decisions freely. But the fact is also that life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness must be reflected in the values of our country in a budget. And I was very proud of the interaction - it's only the beginning - on the budget, led by Ranking Member Van Hollen, to be continued. Where we go from here [is] continued discussion on the budget, which will show the differentiation between the values that we think everyone shares in our country and the misguided proposals the Republicans have in their budget.

"So as we go forward, Ranking Member Van Hollen will be having those meetings with Members about how we build consensus around our budget in support of the principles in President's budget. Mr. Clyburn, as you know, is heading up our Outreach and Engagement Task Force, to give people a reason to register, a reason to vote in this 50th anniversary of the Voting Rights Act. Congresswoman Donna Edwards will be taking the lead on campaign reform, trying to reduce the role of money in politics and increase to increase the level of hope and participation of many more people - all part of that empowerment.

"We are very proud of the role [of] Chairman - I still call him Chairman - Steve Israel, [who] is heading our policy and communication group, so that when we build this consensus within the Party everyone is, again, in harmony, in unity, and in force on it. Of course, our Chairman Ben Ray Lujan will be driving the political course. And we are very proud of the reaction the Caucus has given to him.

"So for us, it was a very successful weekend - almost a weekend, a few days. We were so honored by the President's speech and the Vice President["s] as well, building on the momentum of the State of the Union Address, reiterating - returning to some of those principles and values and specific recommendations, building momentum for the middle class. Thank you."

Chairman Becerra. We have time to take one question.

Q: Madam Leader, two part question. First one: on behalf of my TV colleagues, your reaction to Mitt Romney...

Leader Pelosi. He's out of the race, right? Of course you've got to know this...

[Laughter]

Q: Any reaction to Mitt Romney? Any reaction to Mitt Romney not running for president?

Leader Pelosi. Let me say this: we have Members waiting on the bus. I'm all packed so I can stay a little bit later than the other Members. But let's stay with our...

Q: [Inaudible]

Leader Pelosi. I'm happy to come back to that but let's give them the chance.

Q: Okay, that's fine. Then my other question would be for you - I understand that last night when the President talked about Trade Promotion Authority was met with some skepticism from your Caucus. Can you deliver the votes on that if need be?

Leader Pelosi. Well, I think people are - as I've said over and over, let's try to find a path to "yes". I do not know if that is possible it; it depends on what is in TPP. You know, give us fast-track or TPP. Well, what's TPP? Tell us what it is. I think people are open to listening because we are a party of trade and we understand the global economy. On the other hand, I will say what I said a few days ago: we will make a judgment as to what is in there as to what impact it will have on the wages of America's working families.

Q: If I may ask one hometown question, local media and local political leadership have said we're trying to get the 16th convention here...

Leader Pelosi. Okay, we'll be back to that in a moment.

[Laughter]

Q: Thank you, Madam Leader.

Leader Pelosi. Do you think that's why the mayor was here the whole time?

[Laughter]

Q: Yes, it was.

Leader Pelosi. Maybe he was just attracted to our issues conference.

Chairman Becerra. He was great. Mayor Nutter was great.

Q: You mentioned Congressman Clyburn is leading up the effort on voter engagement. I know you spent a lot of this conference talking about the middle class and how about the middle class. How much have you talked in this conference about the voter engagement issue and voting rights issue in the last couple of days?

Assistant Leader Clyburn. We talked a great deal about it. In fact, we opened on Wednesday evening - the whole evening was about that. And we showed some clips from that earlier era, not just to focus on the movie "Selma" but to give our Members - a lot of them read about or heard about "the Movement", as a lot of people called it. We did two clips: one from a speech that Martin Luther King Jr. did in 1966 - less than a year after the Voting Rights Act was signed in to law - and another one from a speech he gave in 1967 - not coincidentally both those speeches were in South Carolina - to allow our Members to see, despite what you may hear from the other side, Martin Luther King Jr. had a big focus on the ballot box and legislation. It wasn't just about a dream unfulfilled, but he spoke about how that dream should be fulfilled. And so we are focusing a lot of attention on this. And I do believe that to build this middle class economy that is so critical to the future growth and development of this great country, we need to get more people engaged and we are going to work very hard to do that.

Q: And you laid out specific plans to do it?

Assistant Leader Clyburn. Yes we did, and we are going to build them. We have a full task force. The task force has met already and we'll meet at least twice this coming week to really get this ball moving. And they all got great ideas on how we they think we can get this done.

Chairman Becerra. Other questions?

Yes.

Q: I want to ask a question about how this retreat was run. At times, for the reporters here, it seems like this has been like a police state. At the Caucus' direction, staff has been extremely heavy-handed, following reporters to the bathroom at times. Yes, we've been escorted everywhere we've gone. The Republicans don't operate like this. It's not like this when we follow you guys around the Capitol, so why all the heavy-handedness? Is it really necessary?

Leader Pelosi. Republicans don't have the President of the United States...

Chairman Becerra. Yeah. We're not aware that they were following you. We had to have the security in the hotel that we were in because it was expected by Capitol Police that we would be secure. This hotel where the press was located, we did not have those kinds of requirements. If you want to give me names of staff I'll be willing to take them, because they might be ready for the Capitol Police - to work for the Capitol Police.

Q: They said they were operating under the direction of the Caucus and the Capitol Police said the same thing. So, it's unlike any of the other retreats operate and...

Chairman Becerra. Get names because that wasn't at the direction of the Caucus.

Congressman Israel. They follow me into the bathroom too.

Assistant Leader Clyburn. Well, let me say this because something came up at the breakfast this morning: as many of you know, I come from a less than middle-class background. I define middle class aspirationally [sic]. I believe - when I finished college my wife I finished college, together we both made around $7000 a year, but I thought I was in the middle class. So, I'm very, very concerned about the wait staff. And a few of them came to me about some of this and I said to them: look, you've got the President of the United States and the Vice President of the United States. If you read the headlines, you'll know exactly what kind of challenges the security of the First Family is having. And so we're not going to be able - because they wanted to come into the breakfast. Until people are vetted by their Social Security numbers and that sort of thing, we told them: this is not what we would like, but this is what is going to be required. So, a lot of this has been going around - and they understood. So I think we have a responsibility to maintain the security that the Secret Service - because I spoke with some of them - [was] demanding.

Chairman Becerra. We can maybe take one last question.

Q: Actually, this is for Chairman Lujan, who we haven't heard as much from in the last few days. What have you told your colleagues about the 2016 cycle? How are you preparing? You know, Whip Hoyer said yesterday that there's a universe of 60 districts that, through various machinations might be in play or will be competitive? Do you adhere to that strategy? What's the message...

Chairman Lujan. Look, I think that we were all clear and maybe Mr. Hoyer's quote was taken out of context. There's excitement [from] our colleagues and you heard it yesterday. To feel that energy and be able to talk to my colleagues over the hours that followed the presentation last night and into today, this morning, pats on the back saying: Ben, we're with you; we're ready to go; we're willing to do whatever we need to do. There's excitement there; and there's Member engagement there. We're seeing Members stepping forward now - maybe there was something that happened in the past but they're all in. They've said: look, turn the page; we're going forward; we don't like being in the minority.

And the path that we made out was pretty simple. It was majority math. We know Republicans are over-extended. We look at the maps where the President won with strong numbers where Republicans hold those seats - even in the Senate - they're going to be defending 20-plus seats. So we're going forward. And they're having a messaging nightmare. Look at Governor Romney - I mean, one of the questions that comes in is asking about [Governor Romney] and reaction to him. I think Republicans are happier that he's not running than anyone else in the country as we talk about where our priories have to be with the middle class. Charlie Dent - week one, week two, week three, week four. Week four brought us: "it's not the end of the world" to be able to put the Homeland Security Department and the funding for our nation's security and the economic strength that comes with our ports, that comes with that. And what's going to come in week five? Let's look at that together.

So look, we're strong. We're coming out of this around a unified message: it's middle class economics. That means to me being able to put a roof over your head; it means being able to have bread and milk and eggs in the refrigerator, maybe put a little money into the bank; make sure your kids can go to college and look after them. You know, that's what we're talking about. And where I come from, those are the people who are creating jobs, putting people to work. That's where we are all committed - every one of our Members. If you go talk to them - and I challenge you to - we are all about strengthening working families and the middle class all across America.

So, I'm excited about this. When I get a chance to talk about it, let's go, because sleeves are going to be rolled up, we're going to get to work here. So we're going to feel that same excitement from all of our colleagues. And that's what I got coming into this. I'm more energized now than I was coming into this retreat.

Chairman Becerra. Round of applause.

Leader Pelosi. Mr. Crowley would like to answer your question about the convention.

Congressman Crowley. I'd like to thank the mayor for the welcome that he's given to us to this incredibly important city to the United States. We really have had an incredibly warm welcome. And, Madam Leader, I look forward to welcoming the mayor and the entire Pennsylvania delegation to New York for the 2016 convention. Thank you all very much.

Leader Pelosi. And then Congresswoman Beatty who was also on the trip from Columbus - she would have something to say. No, we were very honored by the presence of the mayor. He's always an intellectual resource to us in terms of policy and organizing, and actually, I don't know if you saw his speech the other day, he talked about infrastructure and thanked us for what we did in the early time in the aura. But the fact is: he came to Washington and advocated for that in a very positive way and got results from it. What a wonderful city for many purposes, and this meeting certainly went off very well. So, that's good.

Q: What about 2016, Madam?

Leader Pelosi. Well I don't know. The DNC makes the decision.

Vice Chair Crowley. May the most appropriate city win.

[Laughter]

Q: Mitt Romney reaction?

Leader Pelosi. He probably concluded that the prospect of success was not there, despite the thought that he was going to win on election night. They're a lovely family. He's a wonderful American. He's been a governor, he's served our country in many ways. I don't want to make a joke about his candidacy. But I don't think that - I said he was the preferred candidate, so that tells you how much strength I thought he would have in the general election. Thank you all very much, again.

I just want to go back to one point, because you mentioned about the voting rights and the civil rights, and that aspect of this meeting. I just want to say that I did the close, as we presented Mr. Van Hollen to say where we go from here, discussing budget priorities and how we arrive at them. Week four brought us: "it's not the end of the world" to be able to put the Homeland Security Department and the funding for our nation's security and the economic strength that comes with our ports, that comes with that. And what's going to come in week five? Let's look at that together.

So look, we're strong. We're coming out of this around a unified message: it's middle class economics. That means to me being able to put a roof over your head; it means being able to have bread and milk and eggs in the refrigerator, maybe put a little money into the bank; make sure your kids can go to college and look after them. You know, that's what we're talking about. And where I come from, those are the people who are creating jobs, putting people to work. That's where we are all committed - every one of our Members. If you go talk to them - and I challenge you to - we are all about strengthening working families and the middle class all across America.

So, I'm excited about this. When I get a chance to talk about it, let's go, because sleeves are going to be rolled up, we're going to get to work here. So we're going to feel that same excitement from all of our colleagues. And that's what I got coming into this. I'm more energized now than I was coming into this retreat.

Chairman Becerra. Round of applause.

Leader Pelosi. Mr. Crowley would like to answer your question about the convention.

Congressman Crowley. I'd like to thank the mayor for the welcome that he's given to us to this incredibly important city to the United States. We really have had an incredibly warm welcome. And, Madam Leader, I look forward to welcoming the mayor and the entire Pennsylvania delegation to New York for the 2016 convention. Thank you all very much.

Leader Pelosi. And then Congresswoman Beatty who was also on the trip from Columbus - she would have something to say. No, we were very honored by the presence of the mayor. He's always an intellectual resource to us in terms of policy and organizing, and actually, I don't know if you saw his speech the other day, he talked about infrastructure and thanked us for what we did in the early time in the aura. But the fact is: he came to Washington and advocated for that in a very positive way and got results from it. What a wonderful city for many purposes, and this meeting certainly went off very well. So, that's good.

Q: What about 2016, Madam?

Leader Pelosi. Well I don't know. The DNC makes the decision.

Vice Chair Crowley. May the most appropriate city win.

[Laughter]

Q: Mitt Romney reaction?

Leader Pelosi. He probably concluded that the prospect of success was not there, despite the thought that he was going to win on election night. They're a lovely family. He's a wonderful American. He's been a governor, he's served our country in many ways. I don't want to make a joke about his candidacy. But I don't think that - I said he was the preferred candidate, so that tells you how much strength I thought he would have in the general election. Thank you all very much, again.

I just want to go back to one point, because you mentioned about the voting rights and the civil rights, and that aspect of this meeting. I just want to say that I did the close, as we presented Mr. Van Hollen to say where we go from here, discussing budget priorities and how we arrive at them. But I started my remarks by quoting Dr. King saying that he wanted his children to be judged "not by the color of their skin, but by the content of their character." And I thought that that should be - that sentence by Dr. King, he taught us so much, but to listen to that: "Judge." "Judge" - he used the word "judge," by the content of their character.

And how do we, as a country, address the content of the character of our children when we have their parents not making enough money to put food on the table, [having] two jobs so they don't have any time to mentor them, but if they get sick, they don't have one paid day of sick leave to care for their children; that housing is a situation that really causes some psychological problems for children, when it is in doubt or not adequate. The opportunity gap that we have in our country - in order to address it, we have to address the education gap, and what is happening [is that] 40 million children are going to be on the other side of the digital divide if we do not have the right budget priorities to address education, and the right policies in the budget that address enabling families to have the time to mentor their children, to nurture their children.

What is the content of the character of a nation that does not encourage the nurturing of children in its policies? And I think that, again, Dr. King's words were probably - we think of them, we've heard them so many times, but taken one at a time: "Judge." And we will be judged by the decisions we make to meet the needs of our children, all of Americas children, who are the heirs to America's future. So it was very much a part of our values that we discussed, and our plans for how we go forward. Thank you all for participating and see you next time. Bye bye.

Obama Fires Up House Democrats (Updated)

BYLINE: By Emma Dumain and Matt Fuller

LENGTH: 1019 words

Updated 10:55 p.m. | PHILADELPHIA - A fiery President Barack Obama addressed House Democrats Thursday night, saying while there's more work to do in restoring the economy, Democrats can't be shy about what they've already accomplished.

His remarks, delivered in the ballroom of a Sheraton hotel on the second evening of the House Democratic retreat, were tailored to the caucus's new strategy: Focus the party's message on growing the middle class and take full credit for the nation's economic recovery of the past six years.

"Obviously we were all disappointed by the outcome of this election. There were a lot of reasons for it, and I'm happy to take some of the blame," Obama told the assembled members, their families and their staffers. "One thing I'm positive about is, when we're shy about what we care about, when we're defensive about what we've accomplished, when we don't stand up straight and proud ... "

He then began to list - his voice rising to a campaign stump speech crescendo as members rose to their feet in wild applause - accomplishments on health insurance, immigration legislation and "middle-class economics."

He said he would "happily veto" Republican efforts to undo the Affordable Care Act - not surprising, but a crowd-pleaser nonetheless - along with legislation to roll back the financial regulatory overhaul bill known as Dodd-Frank and a measure targeting his executive orders on immigration.

He slammed Republicans for risking a Homeland Security Department shutdown over those executive actions, saying, "These are the guys concerned about borders, about terrorism? Now you want to make a political point?"

And Obama crowed about proving the critics - namely, Republicans - wrong.

"It's pretty rare when you have two visions, a vigorous debate and then you test who's right," Obama said. "And the record shows that we were right."

In a nod to the middle-class economics message, Obama said Republicans now seem to acknowledge - in rhetoric, at least - the need to help the middle class and address income stratification. He made specific mention to one "former presidential candidate" on the Republican side, Mitt Romney, who "suddenly is just deeply concerned about poverty."

While Obama poked fun at Republicans, he said Democrats "need to stand up ... and not be defensive about what we believe in."

In closing he stepped back from the podium and took a drink of water. "I'm fired up!" he said in a reference to a famous catchphrase from his 2008 presidential run.

An ensuing question-and-answer period was closed to the press, but a source in the room told CQ Roll Call the president addressed higher education, the Affordable Care Act, funding for veterans care and criminal justice changes.

"There was also a discussion of national security threats around the world and the president reiterated his call for Congress to pass a bipartisan [Authorization for Use of Military Force] to show the world America stands united against ISIL," according to the source.

"In discussing trade, the president said he recognizes the deals signed in past decades were not perfect. The president conceded that no new trade agreement will fix all of the real challenges that arise from globalization and past trade arrangements, but was firm that the agreements he is negotiating will be an improvement from the status quo for US workers and businesses."

Obama told members that officials would know within "two or three months" whether diplomacy could prevail with respect to Iran, said a source in the room.

On trade, another person attending the question-and-answer session said Obama urged members to "keep your powder a little dry" and "get informed."

He said "we ... are looking out for the same people," according to that person's readout.

Sources said the president promised the administration would make a "substantive case" and would share with members more information about the proposed trade deals. Rep. Sander M. Levin, D-Mich., had openly criticized the administration earlier in the day on that front.

While the president apparently offered some details behind closed doors, his public remarks were light on specific policy proposals, with no mention of issues like trade or a tax overhaul.

Obama, with no more elections to win and two years left to go, kept things friendly and appeared to relish his time in the spotlight: He cracked jokes about Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's perfectly coiffed hair, poked fun at caucus Vice Chairman Joseph Crowley's imperfectly coiffed hair and wondered about the future of new DCCC Chairman Ben Ray Luján's hair.

Obama said he remembered a time when he, himself, was young and attractive. "Let's see how long that lasts," Obama said of the 42-year-old, dark-haired Luján. "He'll have hair like Steve Israel," he said, referring to Luján's silver-maned predecessor.

In the week since his State of the Union address, Democrats who have felt demoralized since the party's midterm drubbing have said they think their president has a renewed vigor to fight with them to win back seats in 2016. They say his speech touched on the important issues they want to focus on in the next cycle and feel there is a renewed partnership.

The honeymoon could be short-lived with substantial legislative challenges on the horizon, especially when it comes to giving the White House fast-track authority to enter into trade negotiations.

But at least on Thursday night, House Democrats seemed ready to believe that they and Obama were squarely on the same team.

"I'm going to be out there making the case every single day," he said, "and I hope you join me."

House Democrats' 2016 Hope: GOP Is 'Maxed Out'

BYLINE: Alex Brown

LENGTH: 588 words

PHILADELPHIAOutnumbered House Democrats are here searching for a bright spot in the GOP's historic House majority. Republicans' biggest weakness, say members gathered for a three-day retreat , is in their numbers.

Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Ben Ray Lujan told colleagues Thursday his group would roll back GOP gains in next year's elections. How? According to a source at the meeting, he said he believes the 246-seat House GOP is "maxed out." In the 2014 midterms, Republicans made gains in many districts that President Obama won two years before. They also hold nearly two dozen seats in which Obama fell just shy of a 50 percent margin.

The GOP will have its hands full defending those seats, Lujan said, giving it little chance to go on offense elsewhere. Perhaps the biggest targets for Democrats will be the 26 Republicans who represent districts won by Obama in 2012. Another 15 districts are held by Republicans who won by single-digit margins.

Just how much of a dent Democrats expect to make in the GOP majority was left unsaid; in 2012, they found themselves with a 33-seat deficit despite a slim advantage in the overall popular vote.

Speaking to reporters later Thursday, House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer was cautiously optimistic about the party's electoral chances.

"I think we can take back the House in 2016.... Would I tell you to bet a whole lot of money that we're going to take back the House in 2016? I probably wouldn't do that," Hoyer said.

Lujan's pep talk also served as a fundraising pitch, and the source said the DCCC's new finance chairman, Chris Van Hollen, announced that more than $1 million had been raised from caucus leaders and ranking members. Ways and Means Committee ranking member Sander Levin pledged $375,000 from the Democrats on his panel.

While Lujan encouraged his colleagues about the electoral math, other party leaders urged the formation of a more focused message that they believe will be key to earning voters' confidence. "We came out of that session absolutely unified on three essential messagesmiddle class, middle class, and middle class," said. Rep. Steve Israel, who preceded Lujan atop the DCCC. He contrasted that with past Democratic messaging, that often involved "a 23-point plan" on every issue. "The problem is that we may have had too many messages," he said.

Democrats, while stuck in a legislative minority, said they are counting on President Obama to be their "messenger-in-chief," spotlighting the party's agenda in ways others can'tat least, until the party chooses its 2016 nominee. "People felt really good about the State of the Union address," Van Hollen said. Asked what the party would do differently from a policy standpoint in the coming cycle, he responded, "There was already a lot new in the president's speech the other night in terms of additional policies aimed squarely at the middle class."

Like Israel, Rep. Donna Edwards said Democrats shouldn't worry about sounding redundant. "We have been really trying to make sure that we construct an agenda that we're able to repeat and repeat and repeat," she said, citing child care and college affordability proposals in Obama's address as policies worthy of repetition.

After a day's worth of panel discussions, Democrats have a few options for Thursday afternoon. They can attend a seminar on how to "Become a Q&A Ninja," attend a tasting of local wines, or visit Independence National Historical Park. President Obama will deliver the retreat's keynote address Thursday night.

New Mexico Lawmakers Announce $15.6 Million Expansion Funding for State Veterans' Home

LENGTH: 622 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Today, U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham announced the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) has approved $15.6 million conditional funding for the New Mexico State Veterans' Home in Truth or Consequences to construct a new 59 bed facility. The construction and expansion project includes 39 Alzheimer's beds, a 20 bed Skilled Nursing Unit, a new rehabilitation section for inpatient and outpatient services, and a new pool. The N.M. State Veterans' Home must complete items the VA has outlined as requirements for final grant award approval within 180 days from the date they received notification of the conditional funding approval.

The conditionally awarded funding is available through the VA's State Home Construction Grant Program, which provides matching grant funds for renovation and construction of state veterans homes and adult day care facilities. The VA matches 65 percent of the project costs, and states fund the remaining 35 percent. The N.M. State Veterans' Home--the only nursing facility in N.M. dedicated specifically to serving veterans and their families--has planned the construction of a new facility since 2008, and the project is estimated to cost $30 million. It has already secured $12.5 million in state funding and plans to request additional funding during the 2015 state legislative session.

"The New Mexico State Veterans' Home provides top-notch nursing home care for our veterans, and this grant will help with needed updates and an expansion to help better serve elderly and rehabbing patients," Udall said. "As a member of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Military Construction and Veterans Affairs, I am proud to support funding for projects like this to ensure our veterans get the care they have earned. I thank our state legislature for setting aside initial funding for this project, and we ask that state lawmakers provide the full amount so construction can move forward."

"Constructing a new facility at the New Mexico State Veterans' Home will provide our elderly veterans with the best nursing care available," Heinrich said. "This funding ensures that veterans in New Mexico with rehabilitative or disability needs benefit from state-of-the-art inpatient and outpatient services, and a Skilled Nursing Unit. These kinds of investments are critical if we are to fulfill our nation's promise to those who served. Few sacrifices are as selfless as those our military service men and women make in defense of this nation. We owe our veterans and their loved ones more than a debt of gratitude -- we owe them action in both our words and deeds."

"As the one nursing facility in New Mexico that serves only our veterans and their families, the State Veterans' Home helps New Mexico's heroes that come from every corner of the state," Luján said. "Funds for an expansion will enable this important facility to assist more of our brave men and women and give them the care they have earned through their service to our nation. The VA's approval for conditional funding represents another important step toward making the new facility a reality for New Mexico's veterans."

"Veterans and their families deserve every opportunity for quality care and skilled nursing that will help them recover from injuries and live with dignity," Lujan Grisham said. "I fully support this investment and urge the VA to ensure that residents at the State Veterans' Home have access to quality programs and qualified staff."

Lujan Sponsors Measures to Overturn Citizens United and Increase Transparency in Elections

LENGTH: 413 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District announced today that he is supporting a pair of measures aimed at limiting money in politics by overturning the Citizens United Supreme Court decision and increasing transparency in elections. Luján is a cosponsor of the DISCLOSE Act and the Democracy for All Amendment, which would amend the Constitution.

"Five years ago, Citizens United opened up the floodgates of special-interest money into our political system. Since that time, we've seen the rise of Super PACs that can spend unlimited amounts of money while hiding their donors and preventing the American people from finding the truth behind where their money comes from," Congressman Luján said. "The legislation I am supporting would increase transparency in our electoral system and restore accountability, while ensuring that a wealthy few do not drown out the voices of the American people."

The DISCLOSE Act increases transparency through four major requirements:

o Enhances public reporting of campaign-related activity by corporations and other outside groups. All corporations, unions, other outside groups, and Super PACs will have to report to the FEC within 24 hours of making a $10,000 campaign expenditure or financial transfer to other groups which can then be used for campaign-related activity.
o Requires corporations and other outside groups to stand by their ads. All leaders of corporations, unions, other outside groups, and Super PACs that make campaign-related ads will have to stand by their ads and say that he or she "approves this message." Top financial contributors have to be disclosed in television and radio advertisements.
o Requires corporations and other outside groups to disclose campaign-related spending to shareholders and organization members.
o Requires lobbyists to disclose campaign-related expenditures in conjunction with their lobbying activities.

The Democracy for All Amendment amends the Constitution to provide Congress and the states with the authority to determine reasonable campaign finance regulations and distinguish between natural persons and corporations or other artificial entities. A companion bill has been introduced in the Senate by Senator Tom Udall of New Mexico.

Lujan Votes for Legislation to Help Prevent Veteran Suicides

LENGTH: 488 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District applauded the unanimous passage of legislation in the House last night to help prevent suicide among our nation's veterans. The Clay Hunt Suicide Prevention for American Veterans Act expands access to mental health services and increases the capacity and efficiency of VA care to address the needs of veterans returning home from war. The bill passed the House last Congress, but did not receive a final vote in the Senate before the end of last session. It was reintroduced this month with Luján as a cosponsor.

"I applaud the swift passage of this important legislation after efforts to pass it in the Senate in December fell just short. I hope the Senate will act quickly to send it to the President's desk," Luján said. "With an estimated 22 veterans committing suicide every day - more than 8,000 each year, we are facing an epidemic that we cannot ignore. The brave men and women who have sacrificed so much to protect and defend our nation, our values, and our way of life must receive the support they need and have earned. An estimated 600,000 men and women who have served in combat have traumatic brain injury, PTSD, or depression, and we must have the capacity to ensure access to the vital mental health services that can help them heal from the wounds of war. This legislation is an important step forward, and must be part of our continuing effort to honor the service and sacrifice of our nation's veterans."

The legislation, which is named in honor of Marine Corporal Clay Hunt, an Iraq and Afghanistan War veteran who was awarded the Purple Heart and dedicated suicide prevention advocate who tragically took his own life, includes a number of provisions to increase access to care. The bill:

o Establishes a peer support and community outreach pilot program to assist transitioning servicemembers with accessing VA mental health care services;
o Requires the VA to create a one-stop shot, interactive website to serve as a centralized information source regarding all mental health services to veterans;
o Takes steps to address the shortage of mental health care professionals by authorizing the VA to conduct a student loan repayment pilot program aimed at recruiting and retaining psychiatrists;
o Requires yearly evaluations, conducted by a third party, of all mental health care and suicide prevention practices and programs at the DOD and VA to determine what is working and what is not working and to make recommendations to improve care; and

Veterans Service Organizations, including the Military Officers Association of American and Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America have voiced support for the legislation.

U.S. Veteran Affairs OKs $15.6 million for New Mexico facility

BYLINE: Mike English

LENGTH: 222 words

Members of the New Mexico congressional delegation announced Thursday the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs has approved $15.6 million funding for the New Mexico State Veterans' Home in Truth or Consequences to construct a new 59-bed facility.

The construction and expansion project includes 39 Alzheimer's beds, a 20-bed skilled-nursing unit, a new rehabilitation section for inpatient and outpatient services and a new pool.

The project was announced by Sen. Tom Udall, Sen. Martin Heinrich, Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham and Rep. Ben Ray Luján.

Federal funding for the project comes with some strings. The New Mexico State Veterans' Home must complete items the VA has outlined as requirements for final grant award approval within 180 days, or by late March. It has already secured $12.5 million in state funding and plans to request additional funding during the 2015 state legislative session.

"I thank our state Legislature for setting aside initial funding for this project, and we ask that state lawmakers provide the full amount so construction can move forward," Udall said.

New Mexico Lawmakers Announce $15.6 Million Expansion Funding for State Veterans' Home

LENGTH: 656 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Tom Udall, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Today, U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham announced the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) has approved $15.6 million conditional funding for the New Mexico State Veterans' Home in Truth or Consequences to construct a new 59 bed facility. The construction and expansion project includes 39 Alzheimer's beds, a 20 bed Skilled Nursing Unit, a new rehabilitation section for inpatient and outpatient services, and a new pool. The N.M. State Veterans' Home must complete items the VA has outlined as requirements for final grant award approval within 180 days from the date they received notification of the conditional funding approval.

The conditionally awarded funding is available through the VA's State Home Construction Grant Program, which provides matching grant funds for renovation and construction of state veterans homes and adult day care facilities. The VA matches 65 percent of the project costs, and states fund the remaining 35 percent. The N.M. State Veterans' Home-the only nursing facility in N.M. dedicated specifically to serving veterans and their families-has planned the construction of a new facility since 2008, and the project is estimated to cost $30 million. It has already secured $12.5 million in state funding and plans to request additional funding during the 2015 state legislative session.

"The New Mexico State Veterans' Home provides top-notch nursing home care for our veterans, and this grant will help with needed updates and an expansion to help better serve elderly and rehabbing patients," Udall said. "As a member of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Military Construction and Veterans Affairs, I am proud to support funding for projects like this to ensure our veterans get the care they have earned. I thank our state legislature for setting aside initial funding for this project, and we ask that state lawmakers provide the full amount so construction can move forward."

"Constructing a new facility at the New Mexico State Veterans' Home will provide our elderly veterans with the best nursing care available," Heinrich said. "This funding ensures that veterans in New Mexico with rehabilitative or disability needs benefit from state-of-the-art inpatient and outpatient services, and a Skilled Nursing Unit. These kinds of investments are critical if we are to fulfill our nation's promise to those who served. Few sacrifices are as selfless as those our military service men and women make in defense of this nation. We owe our veterans and their loved ones more than a debt of gratitude -- we owe them action in both our words and deeds."

"As the one nursing facility in New Mexico that serves only our veterans and their families, the State Veterans' Home helps New Mexico's heroes that come from every corner of the state," Luján said. "Funds for an expansion will enable this important facility to assist more of our brave men and women and give them the care they have earned through their service to our nation. The VA's approval for conditional funding represents another important step toward making the new facility a reality for New Mexico's veterans."

"Veterans and their families deserve every opportunity for quality care and skilled nursing that will help them recover from injuries and live with dignity," Lujan Grisham said. "I fully support this investment and urge the VA to ensure that residents at the State Veterans' Home have access to quality programs and qualified staff."

The N.M. State Veterans' Home received notice of the conditional funding approval in late September, and therefore must meet the requirements outlined by the VA by late March for final approval of the $15,614,314 award.

Van Hollen Tapped To Serve As DCCC Finance Chairman

SECTION: HOUSE CAMPAIGN NEWS

LENGTH: 168 words

On its website, the Washington Post (1/21, O'Keefe, 5.17M) reported that MD8 Rep. Chris Van Hollen, a former two-time chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, "will serve as finance chairman" for the committee "during the 2016 political cycle, according to senior Democratic aides familiar with the plans." NM3 Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, current DCCC chief, "announced Van Hollen's selection Wednesday morning at a meeting of top House Democrats, according to aides."

DCCC Chief Lujan Gives $150K To Committee.

On its website, The Hill (1/21, Joseph, 224K) reported that new Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chief Ben Ray Lujan is pressing "his colleagues to meet their fundraising goals early - and is leading by example by plunking down $150,000." The New Mexico Democrat's "transfer is one third of the $450,000 in dues the DCCC chairman was expected to raise last cycle. Dues ranged from $800,000 for top Democratic officials to $125,000 for rank-and-file members during the 2014 cycle."

New Mexico: Congressman Ben Ray Luján Votes for Legislation to Prevent Veteran Suicides

LENGTH: 480 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Democratic Party has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District applauded the unanimous passage of legislation in the House last night to help prevent suicide among our nation's veterans. The Clay Hunt Suicide Prevention for American Veterans Act expands access to mental health services and increases the capacity and efficiency of VA care to address the needs of veterans returning home from war. The bill passed the House last Congress, but did not receive a final vote in the Senate before the end of last session. It was reintroduced this month with Luján as a cosponsor.

"I applaud the swift passage of this important legislation after efforts to pass it in the Senate in December fell just short. I hope the Senate will act quickly to send it to the President's desk," Luján said. "With an estimated 22 veterans committing suicide every day - more than 8,000 each year, we are facing an epidemic that we cannot ignore. The brave men and women who have sacrificed so much to protect and defend our nation, our values, and our way of life must receive the support they need and have earned. An estimated 600,000 men and women who have served in combat have traumatic brain injury, PTSD, or depression, and we must have the capacity to ensure access to the vital mental health services that can help them heal from the wounds of war. This legislation is an important step forward, and must be part of our continuing effort to honor the service and sacrifice of our nation's veterans."

The legislation, which is named in honor of Marine Corporal Clay Hunt, an Iraq and Afghanistan War veteran who was awarded the Purple Heart and dedicated suicide prevention advocate who tragically took his own life, includes a number of provisions to increase access to care. The bill:

Establishes a peer support and community outreach pilot program to assist transitioning service members with accessing VA mental health care services;
Requires the VA to create a one-stop shot, interactive website to serve as a centralized information source regarding all mental health services to veterans;
Takes steps to address the shortage of mental health care professionals by authorizing the VA to conduct a student loan repayment pilot program aimed at recruiting and retaining psychiatrists;
Requires yearly evaluations, conducted by a third party, of all mental health care and suicide prevention practices and programs at the DOD and VA to determine what is working and what is not working and to make recommendations to improve care; and

Veterans Service Organizations, including the Military Officers Association of American and Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America have voiced support for the legislation.

NM Dems like tone, proposals in speech; Pearce sees little sign of compromise

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A4

LENGTH: 521 words

WASHINGTON - Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation cheered President Obama's State of the Union address for the emphasis it put on helping middle class families, but the delegation's lone Republican said the speech unwisely discounted the president's need to work with Republicans who control both chambers of Congress.

"It was a different kind of speech and I felt he was really liberated to speak his mind at this point," said Sen. Tom Udall, a Democrat. "It was big themes based on values that were very inspirational."

Udall said the president's call for free community college and expanded family leave in the workplace were the kinds of proposals that will help New Mexicans who are struggling to get ahead financially.

Rep. Steve Pearce, the delegation's lone Republican, said he was taken aback by the go-it-alone tone of the president's speech, especially considering the drubbing Democrats took in the midterm elections.

"Everything felt unilateral - about him and what he's going to do," Pearce said. "The outreach part of it was simply platitudes. Maybe he didn't watch the last election. People spoke very loudly."

Pearce also said Obama's priorities for using his executive powers versus calling on Congress to pass legislation seemed confused.

"He insisted we pass legislation on cyberwarfare and that's probably the place where he's got the most latitude," Pearce said. "Just go and stop them (cyberterrorists)."

Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., said the speech - tailored to highlight proposals for middle-class Americans - would appeal to hardworking New Mexicans who "don't want a free ride; they want a fair shot and a level playing field." He also said Obama has his work cut out finding areas for potential bipartisan agreement in the Republican-led Congress.

"It's going to be interesting finding out where those places are," Heinrich said. "The president is just going to have to be smart about taking leaders who care about specific things and finding out where is there a path to a majority. That's going to be the key to success, that and wisely using what executive authority he has."

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, a Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said the president's speech laid out a stark difference in the area of tax policy, with Republicans working to shield the wealthiest Americans from tax hikes at the expense of a middle-class agenda. He also said Obama's call for two years of free community college is important to New Mexico.

"It provides an opportunity to people all over the country," Luján said. "They provide an education and they provide training and work with local businesses. They are anchors for local economic opportunity."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., also applauded the president's focus on middle-class issues: expanded access to child care, the community college proposal and expanded family leave proposals. But she said the president should have said more about his plans to improve Veterans Administration health care.

"We're not seeing the kind of progress I expect and the same kind of rigorous attention that we need," she said.

LUJAN SPONSORS MEASURES TO OVERTURN CITIZENS UNITED AND INCREASE TRANSPARENCY IN ELECTIONS; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 403 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District announced today that he is supporting a pair of measures aimed at limiting money in politics by overturning the Citizens United Supreme Court decision and increasing transparency in elections. Lujan is a cosponsor of the DISCLOSE Act and the Democracy for All Amendment, which would amend the Constitution.

"Five years ago, Citizens United opened up the floodgates of special-interest money into our political system. Since that time, we've seen the rise of Super PACs that can spend unlimited amounts of money while hiding their donors and preventing the American people from finding the truth behind where their money comes from," Congressman Lujan said. "The legislation I am supporting would increase transparency in our electoral system and restore accountability, while ensuring that a wealthy few do not drown out the voices of the American people."

The DISCLOSE Act increases transparency through four major requirements:

*Enhances public reporting of campaign-related activity by corporations and other outside groups. All corporations, unions, other outside groups, and Super PACs will have to report to the FEC within 24 hours of making a $10,000 campaign expenditure or financial transfer to other groups which can then be used for campaign-related activity.

*Requires corporations and other outside groups to stand by their ads. All leaders of corporations, unions, other outside groups, and Super PACs that make campaign-related ads will have to stand by their ads and say that he or she "approves this message." Top financial contributors have to be disclosed in television and radio advertisements.

*Requires corporations and other outside groups to disclose campaign-related spending to shareholders and organization members.

*Requires lobbyists to disclose campaign-related expenditures in conjunction with their lobbying activities.

The Democracy for All Amendment amends the Constitution to provide Congress and the states with the authority to determine reasonable campaign finance regulations and distinguish between natural persons and corporations or other artificial entities. A companion bill has been introduced in the Senate by Senator Tom Udall of New Mexico.

STATE OF THE UNION for January 20, 2015, MSNBC

LENGTH: 8327 words

CHRIS MATTHEWS, MSNBC ANCHOR: Good evening. I'm Chris Matthews. Let's make some noise tonight.

By the way, in a defiant and at times soaring speech tonight, President Obama made his appeal to the American people for the final two years of his presidency. It comes at a time when Americans are feeling more optimistic, obviously, about the State of the Union itself than at any time since the president's been in office. And tonight he told the country the worst of times are behind us.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BARACK OBAMA, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: America, for all that we have endured, for all the grit and the hard work required to come back, for all the tasks that lie ahead, know this. The shadow of crisis has passed and the State of the Union is strong.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: And all night tonight you saw that difference with the vice president jumping up like a Jumping Jack every time the president spoke because he supports him, and the speaker of the House sitting there like a toadstool not moving at all for the most of the president's speech. So that was a way of sort of keeping track of what the partisanship was going on there.

Anyway, the president said the country has come back from the brink.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: In every step, we were told our goals were misguided or too ambitious. And we would crush jobs and explode deficits. Instead we've seen the fastest economic growth in over a decade, our deficits cut by two- thirds, a stock market that has doubled, and health care inflation at its lowest rate in 50 years.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: And maybe not on the level of the new deal as the phrase, the president made his case for what he coined as middle class economics, middle class economics, and outlined a proposed new tax plan that would shift more of the burden to the rich.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: And let's close the loopholes that lead to inequality by allowing the top 1 percent to avoid paying taxes on their accumulated wealth. We can use that money to help more families pay for child care and send their kids to college. We need a tax code that truly helps working Americans trying to get a leg up in the new economy. And we can achieve that together.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: It's also case by the president for more humbled foreign policy. By the way, the very phrase that George W. Bush promised us -- humility in foreign policy -- and never delivered.

Tonight the president touted his new policy with Cuba, his outreach to Iran in terms of trying to avoid them going nuclear. He called on Congress to pass a Use of Force Authorization for the war against ISIS. He called once again for the closing of Gitmo and he means that. And he spent a fair amount of time tonight calling for a renewed effort to combat climate change.

In the end he returned to that speech he gave in Boston. The soaring speech he gave back in 2004 that moved many of us who watched him.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I want them to grow up in a country that shows the world what we still know to be true. That we are still more than a collection of red states and blue states. That we are the United States of America.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: And what will no doubt be one of the most talked about moments, the president adlib a great retort when Republicans applauded him sarcastically, applauded the notion that this is his last campaign is already over.

Let's watch that little back-and-forth.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I have no more campaigns to run. My only agenda --

(APPLAUSE)

(LAUGHTER)

OBAMA: I know because I won both of them.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Well, that's how he did. He said yes, I know because I won both of them. And then he turned away -- turned away from the sarcasm making clear it was sarcasm to the Democratic side.

Anyway, joining me right now to assess the politics and the policies tonight, U.S. Congressman Ben Ray Lujan, he's from New Mexico. He's chair now of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, responsible for, of course, getting a Democratic Congress elected next time.

We also have U.S. Congressman Charlie Dent of Pennsylvania. And the "Washington Post" columnist, the great Eugene Robinson, who is staying up late with me tonight, an MSNBC political analyst as well.

Congressman Lujan, first, what did you make of the president's wonderful little repost there to the Republicans after they sort of sarcastically applauded the fact he ain't running anymore?

REP. BEN RAY LUJAN (D), NEW MEXICO: Well, look, I think as the president always does he's very in tune with everything that's being said, Chris. But tonight the president -- the president spoke very clearly to the American people about what we have to do to put the middle class first. He made it abundantly clear that trickle-down economics does not make its way to the middle class and that we need to start working on middle class economics.

That should be front and center. And I think that's what the president was trying to adjust at.

MATTHEWS: Did the president's message tonight sell, do you think, in the country? Will they get excited about minimum wage, about the $3,000 child credit, about community college being free? Those elements do you think -- and sick leave and parental leave, if you will? Will they be selling points for the DCCC as you try to win back Congress?

LUJAN: Chris, it's important to all Americans as we see the economy getting stronger, Wall Street doing better, that the middle class is still feeling the squeeze. All of the programs the president put on the table this evening are targeted at making sure that we're paying attention to what the middle class is feeling. That working families understand what's happening when child care is so expensive that it's out of reach to make it easier for them to get by.

We need to even the playing field and make sure that middle class priorities will be at the front of the table and make sure that that what we're going to be prioritizing.

MATTHEWS: Congressman Debt, what did you make of tonight overall? Do you think it will have an impact in either direction for either party?

REP. CHARLIE DENT (R), PENNSYLVANIA: Well, I thought the speech was actually more of a political statement than a governing agenda. You know, that said I think there are probably a few areas of collaboration we can work with the president on, specifically on trade, transportation, infrastructure. I think those are areas. A long-term transportation bill. I think we could -- I'd like to think we can move forward on that.

I'm a little less optimistic on tax reform. You know, if the president wants to talk about a child tax credit, tripling it, I think it has to be done in the broader complex of a more comprehensive tax reform. So those are a few things that I picked up.

On the authorization of the use of military force, I have to tell you, I was a little bit confused. I thought the president said he was operating under an existing AUMF and now he wants a new one. But if he wants an authorization of force he should come to Congress specifically and tell me us what he wants. I have not yet heard that from the president.

MATTHEWS: Let me go to Gene Robinson then.

See, that is the troubling question, is he has the authority but he wants the authority.

EUGENE ROBINSON, MSNBC ANALYST: Yes, which -- I mean, and you cannot reconcile those two things.

MATTHEWS: Right.

ROBINSON: They do not make sense together. And I got to say, Congressman Dent is right. The president did -- certainly did not lay out for the nation what it is exactly he wants. And if he --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Well, he said no boots on the ground but he had -- more forces.

ROBINSON: Well, does he really want a resolution that limits very specifically what he can do? I would doubt that he wants that.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

ROBINSON: I would bet he wants something much more open-ended.

MATTHEWS: Yes. Well, anyway, as I mentioned the president returned directly to the themes. The upbeat themes from the speech he gave up in Boston back in 2004. The speech I have to tell, right afterwards I said here's our first African-American president. Right now let's look at that.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: You know, just over a decade ago, I gave a speech in Boston where I said there wasn't a liberal America or a conservative America, a black America or a white America, but a United States of America.

Over the past six years the pundits have pointed out more than once that my presidency hasn't delivered on this vision. How ironic they say that our politics seems more divided than ever.

It's held up as proof not just of my own flaws, of which there are many, but also as proof that the vision itself is misguided, naive. That there are too many people in this town who actually benefit from partisanship and gridlock for us to ever do anything about it.

I know how tempting such cynicism may be. But I still think the cynics are wrong. I still believe that we are one people. I still believe that together we can do great things even when the odds are long.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Let me go to Congressman Lujan.

I haven't met you before but I want to ask you about that division issue. And, you know, and for the Hispanic people and what we call Anglo people and African-American people, and white people, if you will. I mean, these distinctions, we've lived with them. And do you think they're getting better? Is the president right? Because he seemed to have once again pushed the button of optimism tonight, positively.

LUJAN: Chris, I'm more optimistic than ever that we truly are the United States of America. And what the president outlying tonight was exactly what that vision is.

I'll tell you. What's concerned me all day long is the rhetoric I've heard from my Republican leadership in saying that middle class tax cuts is a nonstarter.

Look, what better place to find something that we can work on than targeting middle class tax cuts to the middle class where it's going to help them in their pockets. That's something that we should unite on. It's what brings us together as a nation and it's what the middle class deserves today.

MATTHEWS: Let me go to Congressman Dent.

You know, you represent Leigh High Valley. I don't have to tell you that. The most probably pivotal part of the state. I grew up in Pennsylvania. You always know which way to win. Check to Leigh High Valley. So I do want to hear from you about this.

Why can't the Republicans who've always supported highway bills, who's always been for infrastructure, it's good money, it's good jobs, it's construction, it's great? The smell of highway building, and we want that back again. Why can't this -- this Republican Congress get it together on building stuff again instead of just letting it rot?

DENT: Look, Chris, I agree we need to do a long term surface transportation bill, five or six years. And we have to be open to revenue sources here. We have to be very open. All of us on all sides of this equation. You know, but I'll tell you that when the president said that we need to do a transportation bill on the one hand but then he has a hard time with the Keystone Pipeline infrastructure project.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

DENT: Which has bipartisan support, I mean, I think he has to take that small step. Approve --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Is there a deal there? Is there a deal there possibly?

DENT: I think so. Look, I think there are plenty of potential agreements. We could use the Keystone Pipeline, he wants the minimum wage, we want to repeal the medical device tax.

MATTHEWS: Exciting.

DENT: I could marry up a few of the ideas and advance something that I think both -- a lot of people in both parties could embrace.

MATTHEWS: Who takes the initiative on that? How's that's happen?

DENT: Well --

MATTHEWS: These deals that I figured sitting there.

DENT: Well, look, on transportation, I would -- I think it would be OK at some point to marry up a long-term surface transportation bill with the Keystone Pipeline. Maybe -- you know, maybe we don't go to $10.10 an hour on the minimum wage but something less than that.

MATTHEWS: Sounds like (INAUDIBLE).

DENT: And tie that to repeal the medical device act which is a job-saving proposal, in my view.

MATTHEWS: You sound like the kind of Republicans I grew up with. Thank you so much for coming on.

DENT: Yes.

MATTHEWS: I mean that positively.

DENT: Thank you.

MATTHEWS: Anyway, the president also made a pitch for higher standards for politics as is practiced in D.C. or not practiced. Let's watch him here.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I served in Congress with many of you. I know many of you well. There are a lot of good people here on both sides of the aisle. And many of you have told me that this isn't what you signed up for. Arguing past each other on cable shows. The constant fundraising. Always looking over your shoulder at how the base will react to every decision.

Imagine if we broke out of these tired old patterns. Imagine if we did something different.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Well, that's what we try to do every night around here and push for deals. I am the greatest dealmaker. I really --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: It's one thing I believe in. Let's talk about race for a second.

ROBINSON: I --

MATTHEWS: I got to --

ROBINSON: Very quickly.

MATTHEWS: Sure.

ROBINSON: We'll get to race. I actually thought that was the weakest passage in his speech.

MATTHEWS: What is this?

ROBINSON: Because --

MATTHEWS: Beefy as with cable?

ROBINSON: He's not exactly the guy who goes over and hugs the guy. So -- you know, it was a good speech but I thought that was the weaker part of it.

MATTHEWS: Yes. Let me --

ROBINSON: Yes, let's talk about --

MATTHEWS: Let me tell you. Listen. I think -- I think you and I disagree. There's a real dichotomy, I think. I think 70 percent of the country really looks up to the first lady. I mean, I think there's a real acceptance of -- and she truly is African-American. She does come from (INAUDIBLE) background.

ROBINSON: Right.

MATTHEWS: Her parents are -- goes all the way back to slavery. They're the original Americans in many cases in terms of 300, 400 years. And yet you have this regular ragging on the president on race.

ROBINSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: And I see it -- as somebody wrote it the other day in "New York" magazine. And I said, all these things that certain Republican on the right do, they wouldn't do for a white Democrat. It just -- so how do you reconcile what seems to be the acceptance of the first family by maybe three quarters of the American people as African-Americans? And proof that this isn't a white country. And yet you have this grabble rousing out there against them.

I think both are true.

ROBINSON: Well, both are true. You know, there's something about the fact of the first black president irrespective of the individual, I think, that seems to have intensified some people's feelings about race in general.

MATTHEWS: Yes. I agree.

ROBINSON: And, you know, good, bad, you know, hair on fire. Whatever.

MATTHEWS: What percent? What percent?

ROBINSON: Who knows, Chris? I don't know --

MATTHEWS: Is it 10, 20?

ROBINSON: You know, some days I look at my e-mail, I think it's a high percentage. Some days -- you know.

(LAUGHTER)

MATTHEWS: You get the worst.

ROBINSON: I get the worst. And they're very ugly. I mean, you know, I get ugly, ugly things about the president, about the first lady, about the first family. You know, but-- and I get a lot of deliberately unfair and tendentious criticism that is not overtly racial but --

MATTHEWS: You can tell.

ROBINSON: Is of a tenor and of a tone that I have not seen before, and I've not seen against a white president. So.

MATTHEWS: I think a lot of these people are dying. I think they're older.

ROBINSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: I think younger people, our kids' age, are so farther ahead on this thing. And we're, I think, better off than our parents.

ROBINSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: And it's just -- it's just -- in terms of -- I'm talking about white people, I guess. But I mean, it just seems like there's something majestic about that first lady tonight. The way she comes out. And I think there's admiration for that family from three quarters of the people. And I agree that --

ROBINSON: I hope you're right.

MATTHEWS: These people that you keep hearing from.

ROBINSON: Well --

MATTHEWS: You're a magnet for this crap.

(LAUGHTER)

ROBINSON: Because you're a great writer and you write positively about the liberal -- the progressive view of race relations and they just don't like it. I guess.

Anyway, thank you. You know you're right.

Anyway, thank you, Congressman Lujan, tonight for joining us.

And Congressman Dent of Pennsylvania. I do mean that about the Leigh High Valley and your brand of Republican as some -- Bill Scranton, Republican, as Eisenhower Republicanism. I grew up with it. And Tom ridge Republicanism. It's not so far off anyway.

Coming up right now we've got the results of an online survey. We'll see what Americans thought of the president's speech tonight.

Plus, it didn't take long for Republicans to declare war on President Obama's agenda led by Senator Joni "the castrator" Ernst. It's been a wild couple of hours for the opposition party as they took to spoil the president's hot hand. Well, they tried.

And this is HARDBALL, a place for politics.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: If we're going to have arguments, let's have arguments, but let's make them debates worthy of this body and worthy of this country.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: Tonight, after a breakthrough year for America, our economy is growing and creating jobs at the fastest pace since 1999.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Well, welcome back -- welcome back to HARDBALL.

The president addressed Congress tonight, of course, on economy. His political fortunes and they're on the rise.

MSNBC's Steve Kornacki is with us now with an early look at how Americans received his speech. This is going to be fascinating. Steve.

STEVE KORNACKI, MSNBC'S "UP WITH STEVE KORNACKI": Yes, so we got some new numbers here. These are fresh numbers from an MSNBC online survey.

Let me just explain quickly what these numbers represent before we get to them and how we got then. We say online survey. You might think well, this is just whoever wants to log on to a site, saying their opinion, and you know not that scientific.

Well, what exactly is this, this is a specific sample of people. This was done in conjunction with Survey Monkey. This is a site where two million people come -- I love the name. Two million people come there and take surveys every day. We had a professional team of pollsters take a sample from Survey Monkey, a smaller sample, then they weighted it for age, for sex, for region, for all sorts of things like that. So it's a little more scientific than your standard online survey.

That said, the margin of error on this is 6.8 percent. That's a little -- you know, on the high than we normally see. So take that into account as I take you through these numbers.

First of all, the bottom line question, what did you make of the speech. Enthusiastic, 28 percent. Satisfied but not enthusiastic, 43 percent. So if you add those together basically 71 percent of the people responding here said they were at least somewhat positive in their reaction to the speech. 21 percent saying they're dissatisfied but not angry and 5 percent say they're outright angry. So, again, 26 percent on the negative side there, 71 percent on the positive side.

That's the bottom line of what we're finding in these numbers. If you look at some of the other stuff we asked about here, is the president focused on the right things by a 2-1 margin, people who watched that speech and responded to it said yes. He is focused on the right things. Is Congress, is the Republican Congress, Republicans, are they focused on the right things? Basically the inverse there, 35 percent saying they are, 61 percent saying they are on the wrong things.

If you ask about Obama's proposals, what he laid out tonight, well, unite or divide the country, a little bit of the majority there saying he would unite the country with that 54-40.

And this is an interesting one, specifically on that tax increase on the wealthy the president is talking about that he'd like to use to benefit the middle class, working class, two different ways of looking at it. Is it a bad idea because -- because the wealthy will help grow the economy? 35 percent saying yes, that's a bad idea because that -- and 63 percent saying no, it's a good idea because the wealthy can afford it.

And again that's consistent with polling we've seen down through the years. That's why this is an issue that so many -- the president himself ran in 2012. Democrats like to run on this. And I think again in laying this out tonight that's something the Democrats may very well be running on in 2016.

MATTHEWS: So just going by your margin of error, 6.8 percent, let's get back to the angry figure. The angry figure is 5 percent.

Could it be that there's less people that exist who are angry?

(LAUGHTER)

KORNACKI: The range I guess is negative 2 to 12.

MATTHEWS: I just wondered. With all these, that's 5 percent are angry and it could be off by 6.8. My god, that's good news for the president. I'm just teasing. Nothing is (INAUDIBLE).

Steve Kornacki, great work tonight.

Anyway, it's been a wild couple of hours since the president's State of the Union. Republicans have exploded into a furry of opposition and some of it has gone off the rails.

Michael Steele is chair of the RNC or was, and Howard Fineman is the global now of this international really effort by the Huffington Post to reach everywhere. Both are MSNBC political analyst.

I haven't had chance to give you a chance to broad brush. You want to start, Michael. This speech, I thought he was up.

MICHAEL STEELE, FORMER RNC CHAIRMAN: Yes.

MATTHEWS: And I think being up is -- like in our business just communicating at night. If you're down, people know that, too. He wasn't tired. He had good sleep. He looks healthy as heck.

STEELE: Yes.

MATTHEWS: He seems happy.

STEELE: He was. And I think because for this president he's feeling freed. He's lifting burdens off of his -- off of his shoulders. He's going to go in --

MATTHEWS: Is this a Janice Joplin kind of freedom?

STEELE: It's a Janice --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Nothing else to lose?

STEELE: Nothing else to lose. And when you think about it, Chris, it's almost coming full circle from 2008, particularly when he puts in a line about not -- you know, I said at one point this would be a red, white and blue America. So he'd kind of bringing all that back. And I think the president wants to move into his own space and that includes even on trade issues, for example, he knows going to upset Democrats. OK. Deal with it.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

STEELE: So this will be interesting to watch with the Congress in the Senate. The Republicans, I think, are actually in a good position, too, because now they have an opportunity to actually go out and lay out some articulate --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Why not these two sides -- OK, I'm back to my old Ronald Reagan- Tip O'Neill jag here. Why don't -- you can see the deals on the table.

STEELE: They're right there.

MATTHEWS: You can see them. Lower the corporate tax rates. Do minimum wage. Do something on infrastructure and do Keystone.

STEELE: Yes.

MATTHEWS: I know it's not purity. But it would move things along, Howard.

HOWARD FINEMAN, MSNBC POLITICAL ANALYST: Yes. And trade.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And since I'm now global editorial --

MATTHEWS: Well, you are. You've got to look at the big things. You've got to tow back that lens.

FINEMAN: It's not intergalactic.

MATTHEWS: Next.

FINEMAN: Yes. All the pieces are there. You're right, Chris. It's kind of like a puzzle. They could put all these pieces together. And as you're always saying you don't have to agree on each individual.

MATTHEWS: Right. You trade.

FINEMAN: You trade.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And all of the pieces are out there on the table to trade around.

MATTHEWS: Well, who's going to be the guy who calls everybody in and say, let's all sit down for all weekend and work out a deal.

FINEMAN: I don't know. But I would tell you one other thing. The other reason that the president was a happy man tonight is that he was able finally to say in his own mind and to the American people that he had accomplished what he'd been hired to do, which is to bring the economy reasonably back.

MATTHEWS: Talking about that couple.

FINEMAN: Yes.

MATTHEWS: The one who wrote the letters.

FINEMAN: Yes. Now what he'd proposed was a whole lot of things to kind of patch the tire in the sense that yes, we've recovered overall from the recession.

STEELE: Right. Right.

FINEMAN: But a lot -- the wages, real wages haven't increased.

STEELE: McDonald's. That's right.

FINEMAN: Which is why he said, don't worry government is going to help you with that.

STEELE: Right.

MATTHEWS: There's no rocking fiscal policy change.

FINEMAN: No.

MATTHEWS: No rocking foreign policy change.

FINEMAN: No. No, no, no.

MATTHEWS: There was no new deal-ish kind of big picture.

(CROSSTALK)

FINEMAN: This is small points to patch the tire, as I said.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And he thinks he's in a position to do that because he did the big thing -- things that he wanted to do in his mind.

MATTHEWS: Well, is that politics?

FINEMAN: The economy and health care and so on.

MATTHEWS: Well, remember, people ceased to say, you and I talked have probably talked about it 20 years ago, we've been together so long. Didn't it come out that after all that Bill Clinton did in terms of big economic growth and all that, the most popular thing he did was that leave thing he did?

FINEMAN: Yes. Family medical leave.

MATTHEWS: I mean, medical leave. That that was the one people -- that's was the one I love.

FINEMAN: That was intensely practical and tangible.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And I think that's what he trying to do here. Child care, sick leave, paid vacation, paid sick leave.

STEELE: Community --

FINEMAN: Free community college. You know, those are -- and reduction of interest rates for existing student loans. Those are tangible things that he wants to do and that he knows that poll -- all those things poll very well.

STEELE: They poll well but here is the problem.

FINEMAN: They're not going to pass to Congress.

STEELE: They're not going to pass to Congress because the bill to pay for them has not been clarified yet. And it's not just all going to come out of raising taxes on the wealthy or -- you know, increasing the capital gains tax. So I think to your question, this is where you'll have some Republicans, a John Thune maybe and a Joe Manchin on the Democrat side, who find that sweet spot for Mitch McConnell to go to the president and say we can put together a deal.

I think you're going to see, Chris, the House come along and follow behind Mitch more than people are thinking that Boehner and the House are going to be pushing a lot of agenda by themselves.

MATTHEWS: Why do you think Mitch will be a better dealmaker?

STEELE: Because I think he has a better sense of the ultimate purpose and goal here. He's looking holistically at the party, he's looking more broadly at where the party needs to be to keep the Senate in two years.

FINEMAN: I'll tell you why. Not only that. He's a bridge between the congressional Republican Party.

STEELE: Absolutely.

FINEMAN: Which is more no, no, no, we don't want to do anything and the presidential Republican Party.

MATTHEWS: He wants a president.

FINEMAN: He wants to a president.

STEELE: That's right.

FINEMAN: He wants to be the Republican leader who got a president elected.

MATTHEWS: A quick lightening question. Which party loves the presidency more? Wants it more? Covets it more?

STEELE: Republicans.

MATTHEWS: That's what I think. Don't you agree?

FINEMAN: Yes. But president --

MATTHEWS: They love the executive.

FINEMAN: But President Obama is doing a pretty good job of inhabiting the office right now.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And that's significant.

MATTHEWS: He was acting president. Has been for a long time. But I get the feeling Republicans really, really, really want that presidency.

STEELE: The executive leadership means stuff.

MATTHEWS: Yes. Commander-in-chief, too.

STEELE: It means a lot.

MATTHEWS: Anyway, Michael Steele. And thank you, Howard Fineman.

Up next, President Obama once again called for equal pay for women. And if Washington is playing catch-up on women's issues, Hollywood is already there. We're lucky enough to be joined tonight by a star outside our usual political sphere. Golden Globe's recent winner, actress Ruth Wilson from "The Affair." Watch it all the time.

This is HARDBALL. The place for politics and Ruth Davis.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: This Congress still needs to pass a law that makes sure a woman is paid the same as a man for doing the same work.

(APPLAUSE)

I mean, it's 2015. It's time.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: We're back to HARDBALL. That was of course my classic laugh there.

That was the president of course this evening closing the pay gap between men and women. A big issue in the workforce, of course. But if the country is still playing catch-up with culture and where we ought to be in values, Hollywood has made some strides.

Many new shows now on television have featured strong, independent women in key roles including Showtime's latest hit series "The Affair." A show about infidelity in the modern age.

Let's take peek.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DOMINIC WEST, "NOAH SOLLOWAY": What do you if I got my own place?

RUTH WILSON, "ALISON BAILEY": What do you mean?

WEST: Just a studio. I could use a little writing space. Finish my book. You could stay there when you come to town.

WILSON: That sounds good.

WEST: I want to move out. It could be our starter apartment.

WILSON: Move out?

WEST: Yes.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Well, that's story on "Affair" which is a really hot show. It's winning all the awards right now. It tells the complex story of an extramarital affair through the varying perspectives of the two lead players, the realistic on-screen performance of those flawed but undeniably human roles. It earned the show two Golden Globes the other day including Best Actress for Ruth Wilson who's with me right now.

She plays Alison Lockhart, a resort town waitress who's coping with the loss of her son and finds herself in an emotionally charged albeit messy romance. She's now starring on the Broadway play "Constellation" alongside Jake Gyllenhaal in New York and she joins me right now in New York, right here with me, as well as Frank Bernie, of course a very respected "New York Times" critic.

I never know what he's going to do right now. He's giving me the look.

(LAUGHTER)

You know, I want to talk about this because I really do think movies are always about today.

WILSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: Every time this movie about "MASH" wasn't about Korea. It was about Vietnam. And everything is always about today. And your shows on television now are serials. They grab you and they hold you. A two-hour movie, that's (INAUDIBLE).

Let's talk about that. Why are we -- why are we in love with the serial idea whether it's, you know, "The Good Wife" which I never miss and your show.

WILSON: I think the habits, it's changing the way people watch narratives and dramas these days. People have bigger TV screens. It's almost like a cinema experience at home. They can watch box sets over of course in their own time -- at their own time.

MATTHEWS: On demand.

WILSON: On demand. So they can watch it in their own convenience -- at their own convenience. And -- so I think that writers, and writers are getting the chance to write novelistic kind of dramas. So the character development over 10 episodes or more.

It's brilliant for actors, writers and directors to have that chance to do that. So that's why I think people are moving, dramas are moving to TV, and where they're becoming more sophisticated.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

WILSON: And the audience are incredibly sophisticated, wanting this material. This desire for it. So I think it's about how habits have changed and viewing habits are changed with box sets and on demand.

MATTHEWS: Frank, you're a -- you know the culture scene. What I'm fascinated with is women characters now are the most interesting by far.

FRANK BERNIE, NEW YORK TIMES: Yes.

MATTHEWS: Certainly Mary Crawley on "Downton Abbey" is the only really truly fascinating person in that show.

BERNIE: You mentioned -- you mentioned "The Good Wife" earlier.

MATTHEWS: Right. Right. Good. Julia Margulies. And almost Joan Fontaine, they are flashbacks to the strong women pictures. You know, Greer Garson back in the '40s. A wartime situation. What are we -- are we getting ready sort of as a country for a woman president?

(LAUGHTER)

I think -- I don't think it's a conspiracy. I just think, look, "State of Affairs."

BERNIE: Right. Right.

MATTHEWS: "Madame Secretary of State." African-American woman is president. You've got of course "Madame Secretary" where Tea Leone plays a very impressive, nice actually, secretary of state.

BERNIE: Right.

MATTHEWS: All women.

BERNIE: Well, I mean, but we've done this for a while. I mean, if memory serves me, there was a show years ago called "Commander-in-Chief" with Gina Davis, was there not? I mean, it didn't last long. It does seem like we have a concentration of them now.

MATTHEWS: Well, they didn't know how to do it then.

BERNIE: Right.

MATTHEWS: Some things are tougher now.

BERNIE: I mean, the concentration of it suggests that some -- in some ways we're getting psychologically ready for it, or at least the entertainment industry is trying to get us there. I hope they're trying to get us there because I think if you look at the number of women in the Senate, in the House of Representatives, it's nowhere near the number of strong female characters we see on TV.

WILSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: You know, when people get together in D.C., they talk about politics, of course. But they also talk about you. And your show.

WILSON: OK.

MATTHEWS: Yes. By the way, can you switch to American now?

WILSON: No.

MATTHEWS: Why can't you --

(LAUGHTER)

MATTHEWS: When you look at a script -- he says, I'm looking at you and your leading man and every show I think of seems to have an Australian or a British actor.

WILSON: I know.

BERNIE: There's a British actor playing LBJ in "Selma." Right?

WILSON: Yes. I mean, it's almost like -- actually Jake Gyllenhaal, that acted the Brit, or the Americans are very straightforward and up front and they say what they think and they say it with passion and clarity.

MATTHEWS: It makes us boring.

WILSON: Well no. But the Brits yet lie all the time. They repress. They're naturally repressed. So they're keeping all these emotions down. And they say something else but they're hiding everything else. It sort of makes them seemingly more interesting than they are, but it's just because they're perpetually lying all time.

MATTHEWS: You know --

WILSON: There's that laugh but it's like that idea of, like, we don't -- we're not so honest with our emotion.

MATTHEWS: I think you're the it female actress right now. Actor right now.

WILSON: Thank you.

MATTHEWS: I think you're it. I think there's something going on now. I really do.

WILSON: Thank you.

MATTHEWS: When you win that Golden Globe, you could be getting some big awards this season. It's just something else.

WILSON: Thank you very much.

MATTHEWS: No, really. I think you're great. And I think that this show is great. And I watch it. I do have to say I think Julianna Margulies is unbelievable.

WILSON: She's that.

BERNIE: You should -- I hope you saw Ruth in "Luther."

WILSON: Yes. Do watch "Luther."

BERNIE: Yes, watch "Luther."

WILSON: I play a psychopath.

MATTHEWS: So I need more television. Anyway, thank you. Thank you for coming on.

WILSON: Thank you.

MATTHEWS: It's great to come over. You're on the stage tonight. And here you are.

Frank Bernie, we read you. I read you and sometimes I try to often agree with you.

Up next, President Obama's big night tonight. He's looking to go viral on the heels of tonight's address. He's launching a social media blitz on YouTube. But it's unchartered territory for presidential politics in a massive scale.

You're watching HARDBALL. The place for politics.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I've served in Congress with many of you. I know many of you well. There are a lot of good people here on both sides of the aisle. And many of you have told me that this isn't what you signed up for. Arguing past each other on cable shows. The constant fund raising. Always looking over your shoulder at how the base will react to every decision.

Imagine if we broke out of these tired old patterns. Imagine if we did something different.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: When we make rash decisions, reacting to the headlines, instead of using our heads, when the first response to a challenge is to send in our military, then we risk getting drawn into unnecessary conflicts. And neglect the broader strategy we need for a safer, more prosperous role.

That's what our enemies want us to do. I believe in a smarter kind of American leadership.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Welcome back to HARDBALL.

President Obama is using social media, of course, and the Internet to reach audiences not reached in a live television address. He'll do an interview with YouTube personalities later this week. And we have the data on Google Searches inspired by his State of the Union address so far.

I'm joined right now by the HARDBALL roundtable tonight. We've got Mike Paul, former aide to former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, and former senator, Alfonse D'Amato. He served both those gentlemen. Lizz Winstead, co-creator of "The Daily Show" and Jonathan Alter, of course, a great historian, a "Daily Beast" columnist and an MSNBC political analyst.

So I'm looking here at the list of topics. Apparently, you know, the Google has put out what the people are looking at tonight. And they're looking at the very topics the president brought up. You know, college, I guess community college, taxes, housing, employment, education, health care, Cuba, economy, immigration and racism.

And Lizz, it seems like people now watch television with their hand doing something else. They're now looking up stuff.

LIZZ WINSTEAD, CO-CREATOR, "THE DAILY SHOW": Yes.

MATTHEWS: And they're going right -- well, we mentioned that. I know some of the earlier Google things I've looked at tonight said people wanted to know where -- what is this, the chamber? Explain where we are, I didn't know that. Who sits behind the president. You know, that kind of information.

WINSTEAD: Well, you know, it makes me think that the president was very broad strokey. And we all watched this and we're really in it, right? But when he does say, you know, a single pipeline, he doesn't say the Keystone Pipeline.

You know, when he talks about -- a trade with China but he doesn't say what it's called, I think that you need to be a little bit more specific with some of these folks who are looking it up because I'd rather have them looking up what are the pros and cons of blank rather than what is blank, right?

MATTHEWS: I love these questions like Alan Gross, the president brought him. You know, he brought him tonight. And you know, here it is. He's sitting next to the president because he was in prison in Cuban, right? So here this person writes, "Why was Alan Gross in prison in Cuba?" I mean, these are pretty basic questions.

WINSTEAD: Right.

MATTHEWS: Was he a spy? What was going on down there?

WINSTEAD: Right.

MATTHEWS: And what is the Cuban embargo? Basic information they want. How do you travel to Cuba? What's a community college? A top question here. How much does community college cost? People want a little more background. Clearly.

JONATHAN ALTER, THE DAILY BEAST: I think the important thing about this speech, some of the lines might be remembered, his tone, which was Churchill-ian when he talked about -- you know, Churchill talked about the broad sunlit up lands.

MATTHEWS: Right.

ALTER: That uplift was extremely important. It will be remembered. But I believe what will be most remembered from this over the next 10 to 15 years is the community college part of it. This is Barack Obama's G.I. bill.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

ALTER: And even though it's not going to get enacted in his term, he will always be credited for it.

MATTHEWS: Who are the people -- give me the picture of who's going to need this.

ALTER: And you've got to understand. Just in terms of new media. So the White House has done these videos every day for six years. Right. The one that was done two weeks ago where the president was on Air Force One talking about free community college was the most watched video of his entire presidency.

MATTHEWS: What was it about?

ALTER: It was outlining his free community college program. There is huge interest in this. In Tennessee which is the prototype where 90 percent of high school kids are going to enroll in this, you know, Tennessee community college program. It was more than double what was expected. There is huge demand for this.

MATTHEWS: Yes, of course. I think it's great.

ALTER: Young Americans know it's the only way they're going to be able to compete in a global economy is if they get that --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Technical. Technical. It's not going back to photography school. I mean, that stuff. It's learning stuff that you get a job with.

ALTER: Right.

MIKE PAUL, FORMER RUDY GIULIANI AID: It's not just that because community colleges are also known as places where you complete your GED first and then you go onto college work. So I think that's one of the reasons when you're talking about the message that you had before, which is this is an inside the beltway message or is it a message for the layman, to the citizens of our country. That's the kind of answer they want.

You need to know that. There are a lot of people that still have not completed their GED. And they're not just interested to go on community college.

MATTHEWS: No.

PAUL: But you're going to help me to complete two things in one. That's a big deal.

(CROSSTALK)

ALTER: That's an important point.

WINSTEAD: And I would say --

ALTER: Nobody asked how do you pay for it? All the Republicans, well, how they're going to pay for it. They're like this is dead on arrival. It's not going to -- the bill passed unanimously in 1944, the G.I. Bill.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

ALTER: Nobody was saying how we're going to pay for it. They understood this is an investment in the future of the country. We need to do this to have a strong nation. And that's what will be interesting to see whether some of that starts to come through.

MATTHEWS: So this means to a kid, with no money from the parents, working kid from the neighborhoods, from the row houses where I grew up originally, and he now or she now knows, look, worse comes to worse, if I can get enough money just to live on, I can go to college.

WINSTEAD: Yes.

PAUL: And I can finish my high school degree, many of them are saying, and I have a lot of guilt and shame surrounding that that many of them have not finished. They might be a little older as well.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

PAUL: They're not 18 years old and going and completing by 20, for example. They might be 19, 20, 25 some of them. And they're going to finish that GED and they're going to continue and get a college degree.

MATTHEWS: And also, from both ends, macro and micro economics, macro, we need a work force. We need trained people.

PAUL: Yes.

MATTHEWS: Who can handle -- you know, like those guys, mostly guys who worked like Euro Motors and fix Mercedes. They're making a lot of money.

WINSTEAD: Yes.

MATTHEWS: And that job needs to get done.

ALTER: So other than Tennessee, Chicago is the other prototype for this. And what Rahm Emanuel did there is he blew up the old community college system. He got 70 local big employers. They took over the curriculums of these schools. One of them is IT. One of them is hospitality. One of them is health care. One of them is advanced manufacturing. And they're actually training kids for the jobs that they need.

The problem is the dropouts are off the charts. So it's like 75 percent dropout nationally. So for these schools to get the money, they have to have programs that get these kids to graduate.

MATTHEWS: All these folks are staying with us. More on this historic night.

I want to get their assessment personally on what they think is going to last from this speech. What's the impact going to be.

But the president clearly had the wind at his back tonight. And I think that Jonathan had it right. There was a tone tonight that was really more optimistic than we've seen in this whole presidency.

This is HARDBALL. Of course the place for politics.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: And everyone in this Congress who still refuses to raise the minimum wage, I say this. If you truly believe you can work full time and support a family on less than $15,000 a year, try it. If not, vote to give millions of the hardest working people in America a raise.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I have no more campaigns to run. My only agenda --

(APPLAUSE)

(LAUGHTER)

OBAMA: I know because I won both of them.

(APPLAUSE)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: We're back with the HARDBALL roundtable, Mike, Lizz and Jonathan. And a final question.

I've got to ask you this because you're in show business here. Did you see the combination of what he threw there? First of all, he retorts with a great -- you know, adlib, puts them down. And he does it like he put his spirit and looked away. Like complete insolence in a way.

That was a little cold. I think he (INAUDIBLE). That was a little cold. And then he comes back with that incredible, irresistible smile.

WINSTEAD: Yes.

MATTHEWS: Remember that he can bring on when he wants to?

WINSTEAD: Yes.

MATTHEWS: There was a lot of action there from him in terms of drama, I thought.

WINSTEAD: I -- there is no bigger sign of confidence than silence and reaction. You know, when you can, you feel you might have done something wrong, you take a moment, you give a smile and you take it in because you know you're winning. Like that's when you know you're winning.

MATTHEWS: Control the signs. I agree with you.

WINSTEAD: Absolutely.

MATTHEWS: Jonathan, historically, you're the big picture guy here, I think, it's fair to say. The president, will this matter? Two weeks from now, three weeks from now?

ALTER: Not a huge amount. But there are a couple of interesting things.

MATTHEWS: I mean, you're sunny up. Will they still be sunny two weeks from now?

(LAUGHTER)

ALTER: It's important that he's not going into the last two years of his presidency on the defensive. He is going to enjoy it and the American public wants their president to be sunny and enjoying the job. And in the last couple of years, there were doubts about whether he liked the job. So he's sending a signal on that. And this was the real Obama who both, you know, trash talks a little bit. That's what he's like in private.

And also he has been really concerned about the original promise in Boston in 2004 that we're going to get beyond red state and blue state America. And this defense tonight --

MATTHEWS: Double down.

ALTER: Of what he called a better politics. He really wants to keep people focused on we can do better. We can have a better politics. We can have a functional Washington. That's his big message going into the last couple of years.

PAUL: You know, but the problem with that is the Republicans are weighted, right now, starting tomorrow, first thing in the morning. And they're going to start pounding him, pounding him, with messages of it doesn't touch the heart. It doesn't touch your pocket. There was a glow around the message tonight in my opinion. I think when he was in his campaign there was beyond glow. There was promise. And there was hope.

I don't think people are feeling that strong attachment emotionally to the message tonight that's going to last beyond the punches that are going to come. Because if we were able, for example, to talk about, yes, I feel it in my pocketbook, I feel it in my family, my job is a little bit better. I don't really have to worry about the stress around health care.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

PAUL: And what it costs, and if someone's going to get hurt. Those are things that are emotions and in politics, as you know, where --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: OK. Lizz.

PAUL: From intellectual perspective.

MATTHEWS: Close it down, Lizz. Last words.

WINSTEAD: You see, what I think is he did something that was very brave when he was elected and that is make plans that take a long time in a country that has learned to put a pie in the microwave rather than cook it, bake it, watch it and see it come to fruition. And now he is seeing that pie come out of the oven, with the economy, with health care being successful. And he can take a breath and with gas prices down he is like this is what I was talking about.

And he gets to do that. So he gets to make big plans and talk about community college and bigger things. And I think that when the economy does great, and now the Republicans have come and punch hard, why do you want to cut -- why do you want tax us? They're going to say, you know what, we need to share in that.

MATTHEWS: Well, they're all views that are going to matter in the next couple of weeks.

So I want to thank our roundtable, of course, Mike Paul, Lizz Winstead and Jonathan Alter.

When we return our coverage continues with a replay of President Obama's full State of the Union address. You can watch that right here coming up.

You're watching MSNBC, the place for politics.

SECTION: NEWS; Domestic

LENGTH: 8243 words

HIGHLIGHT: President Barack Obama delivered his State of the Union address amidst Republican-controlled Congress and Senate.

CHRIS MATTHEWS, MSNBC ANCHOR: Good evening. I`m Chris Matthews. Let`s make some noise tonight.

By the way, in a defiant and at times soaring speech tonight, President Obama made his appeal to the American people for the final two years of his presidency. It comes at a time when Americans are feeling more optimistic, obviously, about the State of the Union itself than at any time since the president`s been in office. And tonight he told the country the worst of times are behind us.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BARACK OBAMA, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: America, for all that we have endured, for all the grit and the hard work required to come back, for all the tasks that lie ahead, know this. The shadow of crisis has passed and the State of the Union is strong.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: And all night tonight you saw that difference with the vice president jumping up like a Jumping Jack every time the president spoke because he supports him, and the speaker of the House sitting there like a toadstool not moving at all for the most of the president`s speech. So that was a way of sort of keeping track of what the partisanship was going on there.

Anyway, the president said the country has come back from the brink.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: In every step, we were told our goals were misguided or too ambitious. And we would crush jobs and explode deficits. Instead we`ve seen the fastest economic growth in over a decade, our deficits cut by two- thirds, a stock market that has doubled, and health care inflation at its lowest rate in 50 years.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: And maybe not on the level of the new deal as the phrase, the president made his case for what he coined as middle class economics, middle class economics, and outlined a proposed new tax plan that would shift more of the burden to the rich.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: And let`s close the loopholes that lead to inequality by allowing the top 1 percent to avoid paying taxes on their accumulated wealth. We can use that money to help more families pay for child care and send their kids to college. We need a tax code that truly helps working Americans trying to get a leg up in the new economy. And we can achieve that together.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: It`s also case by the president for more humbled foreign policy. By the way, the very phrase that George W. Bush promised us -- humility in foreign policy -- and never delivered.

Tonight the president touted his new policy with Cuba, his outreach to Iran in terms of trying to avoid them going nuclear. He called on Congress to pass a Use of Force Authorization for the war against ISIS. He called once again for the closing of Gitmo and he means that. And he spent a fair amount of time tonight calling for a renewed effort to combat climate change.

In the end he returned to that speech he gave in Boston. The soaring speech he gave back in 2004 that moved many of us who watched him.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I want them to grow up in a country that shows the world what we still know to be true. That we are still more than a collection of red states and blue states. That we are the United States of America.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: And what will no doubt be one of the most talked about moments, the president adlib a great retort when Republicans applauded him sarcastically, applauded the notion that this is his last campaign is already over.

Let`s watch that little back-and-forth.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I have no more campaigns to run. My only agenda --

(APPLAUSE)

(LAUGHTER)

OBAMA: I know because I won both of them.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Well, that`s how he did. He said yes, I know because I won both of them. And then he turned away -- turned away from the sarcasm making clear it was sarcasm to the Democratic side.

Anyway, joining me right now to assess the politics and the policies tonight, U.S. Congressman Ben Ray Lujan, he`s from New Mexico. He`s chair now of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, responsible for, of course, getting a Democratic Congress elected next time.

We also have U.S. Congressman Charlie Dent of Pennsylvania. And the "Washington Post" columnist, the great Eugene Robinson, who is staying up late with me tonight, an MSNBC political analyst as well.

Congressman Lujan, first, what did you make of the president`s wonderful little repost there to the Republicans after they sort of sarcastically applauded the fact he ain`t running anymore?

REP. BEN RAY LUJAN (D), NEW MEXICO: Well, look, I think as the president always does he`s very in tune with everything that`s being said, Chris. But tonight the president -- the president spoke very clearly to the American people about what we have to do to put the middle class first. He made it abundantly clear that trickle-down economics does not make its way to the middle class and that we need to start working on middle class economics.

That should be front and center. And I think that`s what the president was trying to adjust at.

MATTHEWS: Did the president`s message tonight sell, do you think, in the country? Will they get excited about minimum wage, about the $3,000 child credit, about community college being free? Those elements do you think -- and sick leave and parental leave, if you will? Will they be selling points for the DCCC as you try to win back Congress?

LUJAN: Chris, it`s important to all Americans as we see the economy getting stronger, Wall Street doing better, that the middle class is still feeling the squeeze. All of the programs the president put on the table this evening are targeted at making sure that we`re paying attention to what the middle class is feeling. That working families understand what`s happening when child care is so expensive that it`s out of reach to make it easier for them to get by.

We need to even the playing field and make sure that middle class priorities will be at the front of the table and make sure that that what we`re going to be prioritizing.

MATTHEWS: Congressman Debt, what did you make of tonight overall? Do you think it will have an impact in either direction for either party?

REP. CHARLIE DENT (R), PENNSYLVANIA: Well, I thought the speech was actually more of a political statement than a governing agenda. You know, that said I think there are probably a few areas of collaboration we can work with the president on, specifically on trade, transportation, infrastructure. I think those are areas. A long-term transportation bill. I think we could -- I`d like to think we can move forward on that.

I`m a little less optimistic on tax reform. You know, if the president wants to talk about a child tax credit, tripling it, I think it has to be done in the broader complex of a more comprehensive tax reform. So those are a few things that I picked up.

On the authorization of the use of military force, I have to tell you, I was a little bit confused. I thought the president said he was operating under an existing AUMF and now he wants a new one. But if he wants an authorization of force he should come to Congress specifically and tell me us what he wants. I have not yet heard that from the president.

MATTHEWS: Let me go to Gene Robinson then.

See, that is the troubling question, is he has the authority but he wants the authority.

EUGENE ROBINSON, MSNBC ANALYST: Yes, which -- I mean, and you cannot reconcile those two things.

MATTHEWS: Right.

ROBINSON: They do not make sense together. And I got to say, Congressman Dent is right. The president did -- certainly did not lay out for the nation what it is exactly he wants. And if he --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Well, he said no boots on the ground but he had -- more forces.

ROBINSON: Well, does he really want a resolution that limits very specifically what he can do? I would doubt that he wants that.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

ROBINSON: I would bet he wants something much more open-ended.

MATTHEWS: Yes. Well, anyway, as I mentioned the president returned directly to the themes. The upbeat themes from the speech he gave up in Boston back in 2004. The speech I have to tell, right afterwards I said here`s our first African-American president. Right now let`s look at that.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: You know, just over a decade ago, I gave a speech in Boston where I said there wasn`t a liberal America or a conservative America, a black America or a white America, but a United States of America.

Over the past six years the pundits have pointed out more than once that my presidency hasn`t delivered on this vision. How ironic they say that our politics seems more divided than ever.

It`s held up as proof not just of my own flaws, of which there are many, but also as proof that the vision itself is misguided, naive. That there are too many people in this town who actually benefit from partisanship and gridlock for us to ever do anything about it.

I know how tempting such cynicism may be. But I still think the cynics are wrong. I still believe that we are one people. I still believe that together we can do great things even when the odds are long.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Let me go to Congressman Lujan.

I haven`t met you before but I want to ask you about that division issue. And, you know, and for the Hispanic people and what we call Anglo people and African-American people, and white people, if you will. I mean, these distinctions, we`ve lived with them. And do you think they`re getting better? Is the president right? Because he seemed to have once again pushed the button of optimism tonight, positively.

LUJAN: Chris, I`m more optimistic than ever that we truly are the United States of America. And what the president outlying tonight was exactly what that vision is.

I`ll tell you. What`s concerned me all day long is the rhetoric I`ve heard from my Republican leadership in saying that middle class tax cuts is a nonstarter.

Look, what better place to find something that we can work on than targeting middle class tax cuts to the middle class where it`s going to help them in their pockets. That`s something that we should unite on. It`s what brings us together as a nation and it`s what the middle class deserves today.

MATTHEWS: Let me go to Congressman Dent.

You know, you represent Leigh High Valley. I don`t have to tell you that. The most probably pivotal part of the state. I grew up in Pennsylvania. You always know which way to win. Check to Leigh High Valley. So I do want to hear from you about this.

Why can`t the Republicans who`ve always supported highway bills, who`s always been for infrastructure, it`s good money, it`s good jobs, it`s construction, it`s great? The smell of highway building, and we want that back again. Why can`t this -- this Republican Congress get it together on building stuff again instead of just letting it rot?

DENT: Look, Chris, I agree we need to do a long term surface transportation bill, five or six years. And we have to be open to revenue sources here. We have to be very open. All of us on all sides of this equation. You know, but I`ll tell you that when the president said that we need to do a transportation bill on the one hand but then he has a hard time with the Keystone Pipeline infrastructure project.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

DENT: Which has bipartisan support, I mean, I think he has to take that small step. Approve --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Is there a deal there? Is there a deal there possibly?

DENT: I think so. Look, I think there are plenty of potential agreements. We could use the Keystone Pipeline, he wants the minimum wage, we want to repeal the medical device tax.

MATTHEWS: Exciting.

DENT: I could marry up a few of the ideas and advance something that I think both -- a lot of people in both parties could embrace.

MATTHEWS: Who takes the initiative on that? How`s that`s happen?

DENT: Well --

MATTHEWS: These deals that I figured sitting there.

DENT: Well, look, on transportation, I would -- I think it would be OK at some point to marry up a long-term surface transportation bill with the Keystone Pipeline. Maybe -- you know, maybe we don`t go to $10.10 an hour on the minimum wage but something less than that.

MATTHEWS: Sounds like (INAUDIBLE).

DENT: And tie that to repeal the medical device act which is a job-saving proposal, in my view.

MATTHEWS: You sound like the kind of Republicans I grew up with. Thank you so much for coming on.

DENT: Yes.

MATTHEWS: I mean that positively.

DENT: Thank you.

MATTHEWS: Anyway, the president also made a pitch for higher standards for politics as is practiced in D.C. or not practiced. Let`s watch him here.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I served in Congress with many of you. I know many of you well. There are a lot of good people here on both sides of the aisle. And many of you have told me that this isn`t what you signed up for. Arguing past each other on cable shows. The constant fundraising. Always looking over your shoulder at how the base will react to every decision.

Imagine if we broke out of these tired old patterns. Imagine if we did something different.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Well, that`s what we try to do every night around here and push for deals. I am the greatest dealmaker. I really --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: It`s one thing I believe in. Let`s talk about race for a second.

ROBINSON: I --

MATTHEWS: I got to --

ROBINSON: Very quickly.

MATTHEWS: Sure.

ROBINSON: We`ll get to race. I actually thought that was the weakest passage in his speech.

MATTHEWS: What is this?

ROBINSON: Because --

MATTHEWS: Beefy as with cable?

ROBINSON: He`s not exactly the guy who goes over and hugs the guy. So -- you know, it was a good speech but I thought that was the weaker part of it.

MATTHEWS: Yes. Let me --

ROBINSON: Yes, let`s talk about --

MATTHEWS: Let me tell you. Listen. I think -- I think you and I disagree. There`s a real dichotomy, I think. I think 70 percent of the country really looks up to the first lady. I mean, I think there`s a real acceptance of -- and she truly is African-American. She does come from (INAUDIBLE) background.

ROBINSON: Right.

MATTHEWS: Her parents are -- goes all the way back to slavery. They`re the original Americans in many cases in terms of 300, 400 years. And yet you have this regular ragging on the president on race.

ROBINSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: And I see it -- as somebody wrote it the other day in "New York" magazine. And I said, all these things that certain Republican on the right do, they wouldn`t do for a white Democrat. It just -- so how do you reconcile what seems to be the acceptance of the first family by maybe three quarters of the American people as African-Americans? And proof that this isn`t a white country. And yet you have this grabble rousing out there against them.

I think both are true.

ROBINSON: Well, both are true. You know, there`s something about the fact of the first black president irrespective of the individual, I think, that seems to have intensified some people`s feelings about race in general.

MATTHEWS: Yes. I agree.

ROBINSON: And, you know, good, bad, you know, hair on fire. Whatever.

MATTHEWS: What percent? What percent?

ROBINSON: Who knows, Chris? I don`t know --

MATTHEWS: Is it 10, 20?

ROBINSON: You know, some days I look at my e-mail, I think it`s a high percentage. Some days -- you know.

(LAUGHTER)

MATTHEWS: You get the worst.

ROBINSON: I get the worst. And they`re very ugly. I mean, you know, I get ugly, ugly things about the president, about the first lady, about the first family. You know, but-- and I get a lot of deliberately unfair and tendentious criticism that is not overtly racial but --

MATTHEWS: You can tell.

ROBINSON: Is of a tenor and of a tone that I have not seen before, and I`ve not seen against a white president. So.

MATTHEWS: I think a lot of these people are dying. I think they`re older.

ROBINSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: I think younger people, our kids` age, are so farther ahead on this thing. And we`re, I think, better off than our parents.

ROBINSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: And it`s just -- it`s just -- in terms of -- I`m talking about white people, I guess. But I mean, it just seems like there`s something majestic about that first lady tonight. The way she comes out. And I think there`s admiration for that family from three quarters of the people. And I agree that --

ROBINSON: I hope you`re right.

MATTHEWS: These people that you keep hearing from.

ROBINSON: Well --

MATTHEWS: You`re a magnet for this crap.

(LAUGHTER)

ROBINSON: Because you`re a great writer and you write positively about the liberal -- the progressive view of race relations and they just don`t like it. I guess.

Anyway, thank you. You know you`re right.

Anyway, thank you, Congressman Lujan, tonight for joining us.

And Congressman Dent of Pennsylvania. I do mean that about the Leigh High Valley and your brand of Republican as some -- Bill Scranton, Republican, as Eisenhower Republicanism. I grew up with it. And Tom ridge Republicanism. It`s not so far off anyway.

Coming up right now we`ve got the results of an online survey. We`ll see what Americans thought of the president`s speech tonight.

Plus, it didn`t take long for Republicans to declare war on President Obama`s agenda led by Senator Joni "the castrator" Ernst. It`s been a wild couple of hours for the opposition party as they took to spoil the president`s hot hand. Well, they tried.

And this is HARDBALL, a place for politics.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: If we`re going to have arguments, let`s have arguments, but let`s make them debates worthy of this body and worthy of this country.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: Tonight, after a breakthrough year for America, our economy is growing and creating jobs at the fastest pace since 1999.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Well, welcome back -- welcome back to HARDBALL.

The president addressed Congress tonight, of course, on economy. His political fortunes and they`re on the rise.

MSNBC`s Steve Kornacki is with us now with an early look at how Americans received his speech. This is going to be fascinating. Steve.

STEVE KORNACKI, MSNBC`S "UP WITH STEVE KORNACKI": Yes, so we got some new numbers here. These are fresh numbers from an MSNBC online survey.

Let me just explain quickly what these numbers represent before we get to them and how we got then. We say online survey. You might think well, this is just whoever wants to log on to a site, saying their opinion, and you know not that scientific.

Well, what exactly is this, this is a specific sample of people. This was done in conjunction with Survey Monkey. This is a site where two million people come -- I love the name. Two million people come there and take surveys every day. We had a professional team of pollsters take a sample from Survey Monkey, a smaller sample, then they weighted it for age, for sex, for region, for all sorts of things like that. So it`s a little more scientific than your standard online survey.

That said, the margin of error on this is 6.8 percent. That`s a little -- you know, on the high than we normally see. So take that into account as I take you through these numbers.

First of all, the bottom line question, what did you make of the speech. Enthusiastic, 28 percent. Satisfied but not enthusiastic, 43 percent. So if you add those together basically 71 percent of the people responding here said they were at least somewhat positive in their reaction to the speech. 21 percent saying they`re dissatisfied but not angry and 5 percent say they`re outright angry. So, again, 26 percent on the negative side there, 71 percent on the positive side.

That`s the bottom line of what we`re finding in these numbers. If you look at some of the other stuff we asked about here, is the president focused on the right things by a 2-1 margin, people who watched that speech and responded to it said yes. He is focused on the right things. Is Congress, is the Republican Congress, Republicans, are they focused on the right things? Basically the inverse there, 35 percent saying they are, 61 percent saying they are on the wrong things.

If you ask about Obama`s proposals, what he laid out tonight, well, unite or divide the country, a little bit of the majority there saying he would unite the country with that 54-40.

And this is an interesting one, specifically on that tax increase on the wealthy the president is talking about that he`d like to use to benefit the middle class, working class, two different ways of looking at it. Is it a bad idea because -- because the wealthy will help grow the economy? 35 percent saying yes, that`s a bad idea because that -- and 63 percent saying no, it`s a good idea because the wealthy can afford it.

And again that`s consistent with polling we`ve seen down through the years. That`s why this is an issue that so many -- the president himself ran in 2012. Democrats like to run on this. And I think again in laying this out tonight that`s something the Democrats may very well be running on in 2016.

MATTHEWS: So just going by your margin of error, 6.8 percent, let`s get back to the angry figure. The angry figure is 5 percent.

Could it be that there`s less people that exist who are angry?

(LAUGHTER)

KORNACKI: The range I guess is negative 2 to 12.

MATTHEWS: I just wondered. With all these, that`s 5 percent are angry and it could be off by 6.8. My god, that`s good news for the president. I`m just teasing. Nothing is (INAUDIBLE).

Steve Kornacki, great work tonight.

Anyway, it`s been a wild couple of hours since the president`s State of the Union. Republicans have exploded into a furry of opposition and some of it has gone off the rails.

Michael Steele is chair of the RNC or was, and Howard Fineman is the global now of this international really effort by the Huffington Post to reach everywhere. Both are MSNBC political analyst.

I haven`t had chance to give you a chance to broad brush. You want to start, Michael. This speech, I thought he was up.

MICHAEL STEELE, FORMER RNC CHAIRMAN: Yes.

MATTHEWS: And I think being up is -- like in our business just communicating at night. If you`re down, people know that, too. He wasn`t tired. He had good sleep. He looks healthy as heck.

STEELE: Yes.

MATTHEWS: He seems happy.

STEELE: He was. And I think because for this president he`s feeling freed. He`s lifting burdens off of his -- off of his shoulders. He`s going to go in --

MATTHEWS: Is this a Janice Joplin kind of freedom?

STEELE: It`s a Janice --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Nothing else to lose?

STEELE: Nothing else to lose. And when you think about it, Chris, it`s almost coming full circle from 2008, particularly when he puts in a line about not -- you know, I said at one point this would be a red, white and blue America. So he`d kind of bringing all that back. And I think the president wants to move into his own space and that includes even on trade issues, for example, he knows going to upset Democrats. OK. Deal with it.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

STEELE: So this will be interesting to watch with the Congress in the Senate. The Republicans, I think, are actually in a good position, too, because now they have an opportunity to actually go out and lay out some articulate --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Why not these two sides -- OK, I`m back to my old Ronald Reagan- Tip O`Neill jag here. Why don`t -- you can see the deals on the table.

STEELE: They`re right there.

MATTHEWS: You can see them. Lower the corporate tax rates. Do minimum wage. Do something on infrastructure and do Keystone.

STEELE: Yes.

MATTHEWS: I know it`s not purity. But it would move things along, Howard.

HOWARD FINEMAN, MSNBC POLITICAL ANALYST: Yes. And trade.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And since I`m now global editorial --

MATTHEWS: Well, you are. You`ve got to look at the big things. You`ve got to tow back that lens.

FINEMAN: It`s not intergalactic.

MATTHEWS: Next.

FINEMAN: Yes. All the pieces are there. You`re right, Chris. It`s kind of like a puzzle. They could put all these pieces together. And as you`re always saying you don`t have to agree on each individual.

MATTHEWS: Right. You trade.

FINEMAN: You trade.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And all of the pieces are out there on the table to trade around.

MATTHEWS: Well, who`s going to be the guy who calls everybody in and say, let`s all sit down for all weekend and work out a deal.

FINEMAN: I don`t know. But I would tell you one other thing. The other reason that the president was a happy man tonight is that he was able finally to say in his own mind and to the American people that he had accomplished what he`d been hired to do, which is to bring the economy reasonably back.

MATTHEWS: Talking about that couple.

FINEMAN: Yes.

MATTHEWS: The one who wrote the letters.

FINEMAN: Yes. Now what he`d proposed was a whole lot of things to kind of patch the tire in the sense that yes, we`ve recovered overall from the recession.

STEELE: Right. Right.

FINEMAN: But a lot -- the wages, real wages haven`t increased.

STEELE: McDonald`s. That`s right.

FINEMAN: Which is why he said, don`t worry government is going to help you with that.

STEELE: Right.

MATTHEWS: There`s no rocking fiscal policy change.

FINEMAN: No.

MATTHEWS: No rocking foreign policy change.

FINEMAN: No. No, no, no.

MATTHEWS: There was no new deal-ish kind of big picture.

(CROSSTALK)

FINEMAN: This is small points to patch the tire, as I said.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And he thinks he`s in a position to do that because he did the big thing -- things that he wanted to do in his mind.

MATTHEWS: Well, is that politics?

FINEMAN: The economy and health care and so on.

MATTHEWS: Well, remember, people ceased to say, you and I talked have probably talked about it 20 years ago, we`ve been together so long. Didn`t it come out that after all that Bill Clinton did in terms of big economic growth and all that, the most popular thing he did was that leave thing he did?

FINEMAN: Yes. Family medical leave.

MATTHEWS: I mean, medical leave. That that was the one people -- that`s was the one I love.

FINEMAN: That was intensely practical and tangible.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And I think that`s what he trying to do here. Child care, sick leave, paid vacation, paid sick leave.

STEELE: Community --

FINEMAN: Free community college. You know, those are -- and reduction of interest rates for existing student loans. Those are tangible things that he wants to do and that he knows that poll -- all those things poll very well.

STEELE: They poll well but here is the problem.

FINEMAN: They`re not going to pass to Congress.

STEELE: They`re not going to pass to Congress because the bill to pay for them has not been clarified yet. And it`s not just all going to come out of raising taxes on the wealthy or -- you know, increasing the capital gains tax. So I think to your question, this is where you`ll have some Republicans, a John Thune maybe and a Joe Manchin on the Democrat side, who find that sweet spot for Mitch McConnell to go to the president and say we can put together a deal.

I think you`re going to see, Chris, the House come along and follow behind Mitch more than people are thinking that Boehner and the House are going to be pushing a lot of agenda by themselves.

MATTHEWS: Why do you think Mitch will be a better dealmaker?

STEELE: Because I think he has a better sense of the ultimate purpose and goal here. He`s looking holistically at the party, he`s looking more broadly at where the party needs to be to keep the Senate in two years.

FINEMAN: I`ll tell you why. Not only that. He`s a bridge between the congressional Republican Party.

STEELE: Absolutely.

FINEMAN: Which is more no, no, no, we don`t want to do anything and the presidential Republican Party.

MATTHEWS: He wants a president.

FINEMAN: He wants to a president.

STEELE: That`s right.

FINEMAN: He wants to be the Republican leader who got a president elected.

MATTHEWS: A quick lightening question. Which party loves the presidency more? Wants it more? Covets it more?

STEELE: Republicans.

MATTHEWS: That`s what I think. Don`t you agree?

FINEMAN: Yes. But president --

MATTHEWS: They love the executive.

FINEMAN: But President Obama is doing a pretty good job of inhabiting the office right now.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And that`s significant.

MATTHEWS: He was acting president. Has been for a long time. But I get the feeling Republicans really, really, really want that presidency.

STEELE: The executive leadership means stuff.

MATTHEWS: Yes. Commander-in-chief, too.

STEELE: It means a lot.

MATTHEWS: Anyway, Michael Steele. And thank you, Howard Fineman.

Up next, President Obama once again called for equal pay for women. And if Washington is playing catch-up on women`s issues, Hollywood is already there. We`re lucky enough to be joined tonight by a star outside our usual political sphere. Golden Globe`s recent winner, actress Ruth Wilson from "The Affair." Watch it all the time.

This is HARDBALL. The place for politics and Ruth Davis.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: This Congress still needs to pass a law that makes sure a woman is paid the same as a man for doing the same work.

(APPLAUSE)

I mean, it`s 2015. It`s time.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: We`re back to HARDBALL. That was of course my classic laugh there.

That was the president of course this evening closing the pay gap between men and women. A big issue in the workforce, of course. But if the country is still playing catch-up with culture and where we ought to be in values, Hollywood has made some strides.

Many new shows now on television have featured strong, independent women in key roles including Showtime`s latest hit series "The Affair." A show about infidelity in the modern age.

Let`s take peek.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DOMINIC WEST, "NOAH SOLLOWAY": What do you if I got my own place?

RUTH WILSON, "ALISON BAILEY": What do you mean?

WEST: Just a studio. I could use a little writing space. Finish my book. You could stay there when you come to town.

WILSON: That sounds good.

WEST: I want to move out. It could be our starter apartment.

WILSON: Move out?

WEST: Yes.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Well, that`s story on "Affair" which is a really hot show. It`s winning all the awards right now. It tells the complex story of an extramarital affair through the varying perspectives of the two lead players, the realistic on-screen performance of those flawed but undeniably human roles. It earned the show two Golden Globes the other day including Best Actress for Ruth Wilson who`s with me right now.

She plays Alison Lockhart, a resort town waitress who`s coping with the loss of her son and finds herself in an emotionally charged albeit messy romance. She`s now starring on the Broadway play "Constellation" alongside Jake Gyllenhaal in New York and she joins me right now in New York, right here with me, as well as Frank Bernie, of course a very respected "New York Times" critic.

I never know what he`s going to do right now. He`s giving me the look.

(LAUGHTER)

You know, I want to talk about this because I really do think movies are always about today.

WILSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: Every time this movie about "MASH" wasn`t about Korea. It was about Vietnam. And everything is always about today. And your shows on television now are serials. They grab you and they hold you. A two-hour movie, that`s (INAUDIBLE).

Let`s talk about that. Why are we -- why are we in love with the serial idea whether it`s, you know, "The Good Wife" which I never miss and your show.

WILSON: I think the habits, it`s changing the way people watch narratives and dramas these days. People have bigger TV screens. It`s almost like a cinema experience at home. They can watch box sets over of course in their own time -- at their own time.

MATTHEWS: On demand.

WILSON: On demand. So they can watch it in their own convenience -- at their own convenience. And -- so I think that writers, and writers are getting the chance to write novelistic kind of dramas. So the character development over 10 episodes or more.

It`s brilliant for actors, writers and directors to have that chance to do that. So that`s why I think people are moving, dramas are moving to TV, and where they`re becoming more sophisticated.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

WILSON: And the audience are incredibly sophisticated, wanting this material. This desire for it. So I think it`s about how habits have changed and viewing habits are changed with box sets and on demand.

MATTHEWS: Frank, you`re a -- you know the culture scene. What I`m fascinated with is women characters now are the most interesting by far.

FRANK BERNIE, NEW YORK TIMES: Yes.

MATTHEWS: Certainly Mary Crawley on "Downton Abbey" is the only really truly fascinating person in that show.

BERNIE: You mentioned -- you mentioned "The Good Wife" earlier.

MATTHEWS: Right. Right. Good. Julia Margulies. And almost Joan Fontaine, they are flashbacks to the strong women pictures. You know, Greer Garson back in the `40s. A wartime situation. What are we -- are we getting ready sort of as a country for a woman president?

(LAUGHTER)

I think -- I don`t think it`s a conspiracy. I just think, look, "State of Affairs."

BERNIE: Right. Right.

MATTHEWS: "Madame Secretary of State." African-American woman is president. You`ve got of course "Madame Secretary" where Tea Leone plays a very impressive, nice actually, secretary of state.

BERNIE: Right.

MATTHEWS: All women.

BERNIE: Well, I mean, but we`ve done this for a while. I mean, if memory serves me, there was a show years ago called "Commander-in-Chief" with Gina Davis, was there not? I mean, it didn`t last long. It does seem like we have a concentration of them now.

MATTHEWS: Well, they didn`t know how to do it then.

BERNIE: Right.

MATTHEWS: Some things are tougher now.

BERNIE: I mean, the concentration of it suggests that some -- in some ways we`re getting psychologically ready for it, or at least the entertainment industry is trying to get us there. I hope they`re trying to get us there because I think if you look at the number of women in the Senate, in the House of Representatives, it`s nowhere near the number of strong female characters we see on TV.

WILSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: You know, when people get together in D.C., they talk about politics, of course. But they also talk about you. And your show.

WILSON: OK.

MATTHEWS: Yes. By the way, can you switch to American now?

WILSON: No.

MATTHEWS: Why can`t you --

(LAUGHTER)

MATTHEWS: When you look at a script -- he says, I`m looking at you and your leading man and every show I think of seems to have an Australian or a British actor.

WILSON: I know.

BERNIE: There`s a British actor playing LBJ in "Selma." Right?

WILSON: Yes. I mean, it`s almost like -- actually Jake Gyllenhaal, that acted the Brit, or the Americans are very straightforward and up front and they say what they think and they say it with passion and clarity.

MATTHEWS: It makes us boring.

WILSON: Well no. But the Brits yet lie all the time. They repress. They`re naturally repressed. So they`re keeping all these emotions down. And they say something else but they`re hiding everything else. It sort of makes them seemingly more interesting than they are, but it`s just because they`re perpetually lying all time.

MATTHEWS: You know --

WILSON: There`s that laugh but it`s like that idea of, like, we don`t -- we`re not so honest with our emotion.

MATTHEWS: I think you`re the it female actress right now. Actor right now.

WILSON: Thank you.

MATTHEWS: I think you`re it. I think there`s something going on now. I really do.

WILSON: Thank you.

MATTHEWS: When you win that Golden Globe, you could be getting some big awards this season. It`s just something else.

WILSON: Thank you very much.

MATTHEWS: No, really. I think you`re great. And I think that this show is great. And I watch it. I do have to say I think Julianna Margulies is unbelievable.

WILSON: She`s that.

BERNIE: You should -- I hope you saw Ruth in "Luther."

WILSON: Yes. Do watch "Luther."

BERNIE: Yes, watch "Luther."

WILSON: I play a psychopath.

MATTHEWS: So I need more television. Anyway, thank you. Thank you for coming on.

WILSON: Thank you.

MATTHEWS: It`s great to come over. You`re on the stage tonight. And here you are.

Frank Bernie, we read you. I read you and sometimes I try to often agree with you.

Up next, President Obama`s big night tonight. He`s looking to go viral on the heels of tonight`s address. He`s launching a social media blitz on YouTube. But it`s unchartered territory for presidential politics in a massive scale.

You`re watching HARDBALL. The place for politics.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I`ve served in Congress with many of you. I know many of you well. There are a lot of good people here on both sides of the aisle. And many of you have told me that this isn`t what you signed up for. Arguing past each other on cable shows. The constant fund raising. Always looking over your shoulder at how the base will react to every decision.

Imagine if we broke out of these tired old patterns. Imagine if we did something different.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: When we make rash decisions, reacting to the headlines, instead of using our heads, when the first response to a challenge is to send in our military, then we risk getting drawn into unnecessary conflicts. And neglect the broader strategy we need for a safer, more prosperous role.

That`s what our enemies want us to do. I believe in a smarter kind of American leadership.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Welcome back to HARDBALL.

President Obama is using social media, of course, and the Internet to reach audiences not reached in a live television address. He`ll do an interview with YouTube personalities later this week. And we have the data on Google Searches inspired by his State of the Union address so far.

I`m joined right now by the HARDBALL roundtable tonight. We`ve got Mike Paul, former aide to former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, and former senator, Alfonse D`Amato. He served both those gentlemen. Lizz Winstead, co-creator of "The Daily Show" and Jonathan Alter, of course, a great historian, a "Daily Beast" columnist and an MSNBC political analyst.

So I`m looking here at the list of topics. Apparently, you know, the Google has put out what the people are looking at tonight. And they`re looking at the very topics the president brought up. You know, college, I guess community college, taxes, housing, employment, education, health care, Cuba, economy, immigration and racism.

And Lizz, it seems like people now watch television with their hand doing something else. They`re now looking up stuff.

LIZZ WINSTEAD, CO-CREATOR, "THE DAILY SHOW": Yes.

MATTHEWS: And they`re going right -- well, we mentioned that. I know some of the earlier Google things I`ve looked at tonight said people wanted to know where -- what is this, the chamber? Explain where we are, I didn`t know that. Who sits behind the president. You know, that kind of information.

WINSTEAD: Well, you know, it makes me think that the president was very broad strokey. And we all watched this and we`re really in it, right? But when he does say, you know, a single pipeline, he doesn`t say the Keystone Pipeline.

You know, when he talks about -- a trade with China but he doesn`t say what it`s called, I think that you need to be a little bit more specific with some of these folks who are looking it up because I`d rather have them looking up what are the pros and cons of blank rather than what is blank, right?

MATTHEWS: I love these questions like Alan Gross, the president brought him. You know, he brought him tonight. And you know, here it is. He`s sitting next to the president because he was in prison in Cuban, right? So here this person writes, "Why was Alan Gross in prison in Cuba?" I mean, these are pretty basic questions.

WINSTEAD: Right.

MATTHEWS: Was he a spy? What was going on down there?

WINSTEAD: Right.

MATTHEWS: And what is the Cuban embargo? Basic information they want. How do you travel to Cuba? What`s a community college? A top question here. How much does community college cost? People want a little more background. Clearly.

JONATHAN ALTER, THE DAILY BEAST: I think the important thing about this speech, some of the lines might be remembered, his tone, which was Churchill-ian when he talked about -- you know, Churchill talked about the broad sunlit up lands.

MATTHEWS: Right.

ALTER: That uplift was extremely important. It will be remembered. But I believe what will be most remembered from this over the next 10 to 15 years is the community college part of it. This is Barack Obama`s G.I. bill.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

ALTER: And even though it`s not going to get enacted in his term, he will always be credited for it.

MATTHEWS: Who are the people -- give me the picture of who`s going to need this.

ALTER: And you`ve got to understand. Just in terms of new media. So the White House has done these videos every day for six years. Right. The one that was done two weeks ago where the president was on Air Force One talking about free community college was the most watched video of his entire presidency.

MATTHEWS: What was it about?

ALTER: It was outlining his free community college program. There is huge interest in this. In Tennessee which is the prototype where 90 percent of high school kids are going to enroll in this, you know, Tennessee community college program. It was more than double what was expected. There is huge demand for this.

MATTHEWS: Yes, of course. I think it`s great.

ALTER: Young Americans know it`s the only way they`re going to be able to compete in a global economy is if they get that --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Technical. Technical. It`s not going back to photography school. I mean, that stuff. It`s learning stuff that you get a job with.

ALTER: Right.

MIKE PAUL, FORMER RUDY GIULIANI AID: It`s not just that because community colleges are also known as places where you complete your GED first and then you go onto college work. So I think that`s one of the reasons when you`re talking about the message that you had before, which is this is an inside the beltway message or is it a message for the layman, to the citizens of our country. That`s the kind of answer they want.

You need to know that. There are a lot of people that still have not completed their GED. And they`re not just interested to go on community college.

MATTHEWS: No.

PAUL: But you`re going to help me to complete two things in one. That`s a big deal.

(CROSSTALK)

ALTER: That`s an important point.

WINSTEAD: And I would say --

ALTER: Nobody asked how do you pay for it? All the Republicans, well, how they`re going to pay for it. They`re like this is dead on arrival. It`s not going to -- the bill passed unanimously in 1944, the G.I. Bill.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

ALTER: Nobody was saying how we`re going to pay for it. They understood this is an investment in the future of the country. We need to do this to have a strong nation. And that`s what will be interesting to see whether some of that starts to come through.

MATTHEWS: So this means to a kid, with no money from the parents, working kid from the neighborhoods, from the row houses where I grew up originally, and he now or she now knows, look, worse comes to worse, if I can get enough money just to live on, I can go to college.

WINSTEAD: Yes.

PAUL: And I can finish my high school degree, many of them are saying, and I have a lot of guilt and shame surrounding that that many of them have not finished. They might be a little older as well.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

PAUL: They`re not 18 years old and going and completing by 20, for example. They might be 19, 20, 25 some of them. And they`re going to finish that GED and they`re going to continue and get a college degree.

MATTHEWS: And also, from both ends, macro and micro economics, macro, we need a work force. We need trained people.

PAUL: Yes.

MATTHEWS: Who can handle -- you know, like those guys, mostly guys who worked like Euro Motors and fix Mercedes. They`re making a lot of money.

WINSTEAD: Yes.

MATTHEWS: And that job needs to get done.

ALTER: So other than Tennessee, Chicago is the other prototype for this. And what Rahm Emanuel did there is he blew up the old community college system. He got 70 local big employers. They took over the curriculums of these schools. One of them is IT. One of them is hospitality. One of them is health care. One of them is advanced manufacturing. And they`re actually training kids for the jobs that they need.

The problem is the dropouts are off the charts. So it`s like 75 percent dropout nationally. So for these schools to get the money, they have to have programs that get these kids to graduate.

MATTHEWS: All these folks are staying with us. More on this historic night.

I want to get their assessment personally on what they think is going to last from this speech. What`s the impact going to be.

But the president clearly had the wind at his back tonight. And I think that Jonathan had it right. There was a tone tonight that was really more optimistic than we`ve seen in this whole presidency.

This is HARDBALL. Of course the place for politics.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: And everyone in this Congress who still refuses to raise the minimum wage, I say this. If you truly believe you can work full time and support a family on less than $15,000 a year, try it. If not, vote to give millions of the hardest working people in America a raise.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I have no more campaigns to run. My only agenda --

(APPLAUSE)

(LAUGHTER)

OBAMA: I know because I won both of them.

(APPLAUSE)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: We`re back with the HARDBALL roundtable, Mike, Lizz and Jonathan. And a final question.

I`ve got to ask you this because you`re in show business here. Did you see the combination of what he threw there? First of all, he retorts with a great -- you know, adlib, puts them down. And he does it like he put his spirit and looked away. Like complete insolence in a way.

That was a little cold. I think he (INAUDIBLE). That was a little cold. And then he comes back with that incredible, irresistible smile.

WINSTEAD: Yes.

MATTHEWS: Remember that he can bring on when he wants to?

WINSTEAD: Yes.

MATTHEWS: There was a lot of action there from him in terms of drama, I thought.

WINSTEAD: I -- there is no bigger sign of confidence than silence and reaction. You know, when you can, you feel you might have done something wrong, you take a moment, you give a smile and you take it in because you know you`re winning. Like that`s when you know you`re winning.

MATTHEWS: Control the signs. I agree with you.

WINSTEAD: Absolutely.

MATTHEWS: Jonathan, historically, you`re the big picture guy here, I think, it`s fair to say. The president, will this matter? Two weeks from now, three weeks from now?

ALTER: Not a huge amount. But there are a couple of interesting things.

MATTHEWS: I mean, you`re sunny up. Will they still be sunny two weeks from now?

(LAUGHTER)

ALTER: It`s important that he`s not going into the last two years of his presidency on the defensive. He is going to enjoy it and the American public wants their president to be sunny and enjoying the job. And in the last couple of years, there were doubts about whether he liked the job. So he`s sending a signal on that. And this was the real Obama who both, you know, trash talks a little bit. That`s what he`s like in private.

And also he has been really concerned about the original promise in Boston in 2004 that we`re going to get beyond red state and blue state America. And this defense tonight --

MATTHEWS: Double down.

ALTER: Of what he called a better politics. He really wants to keep people focused on we can do better. We can have a better politics. We can have a functional Washington. That`s his big message going into the last couple of years.

PAUL: You know, but the problem with that is the Republicans are weighted, right now, starting tomorrow, first thing in the morning. And they`re going to start pounding him, pounding him, with messages of it doesn`t touch the heart. It doesn`t touch your pocket. There was a glow around the message tonight in my opinion. I think when he was in his campaign there was beyond glow. There was promise. And there was hope.

I don`t think people are feeling that strong attachment emotionally to the message tonight that`s going to last beyond the punches that are going to come. Because if we were able, for example, to talk about, yes, I feel it in my pocketbook, I feel it in my family, my job is a little bit better. I don`t really have to worry about the stress around health care.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

PAUL: And what it costs, and if someone`s going to get hurt. Those are things that are emotions and in politics, as you know, where --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: OK. Lizz.

PAUL: From intellectual perspective.

MATTHEWS: Close it down, Lizz. Last words.

WINSTEAD: You see, what I think is he did something that was very brave when he was elected and that is make plans that take a long time in a country that has learned to put a pie in the microwave rather than cook it, bake it, watch it and see it come to fruition. And now he is seeing that pie come out of the oven, with the economy, with health care being successful. And he can take a breath and with gas prices down he is like this is what I was talking about.

And he gets to do that. So he gets to make big plans and talk about community college and bigger things. And I think that when the economy does great, and now the Republicans have come and punch hard, why do you want to cut -- why do you want tax us? They`re going to say, you know what, we need to share in that.

MATTHEWS: Well, they`re all views that are going to matter in the next couple of weeks.

So I want to thank our roundtable, of course, Mike Paul, Lizz Winstead and Jonathan Alter.

When we return our coverage continues with a replay of President Obama`s full State of the Union address. You can watch that right here coming up.

You`re watching MSNBC, the place for politics.

Rep. Lujan Posts Congressional Biography on Capitol Hill Web Site

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 753 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., a member of the 114th Congress, has posted the following biography:

Born and raised in New Mexico, Rep. Ben Ray Lujan grew up in Nambe, a small farming community north of Santa Fe bordered by the pueblos of Nambe and Pojoaque. There he learned the time-honored traditions and values of New Mexico.

Since he was sworn into Congress, job creation, reforming health insurance, building a clean energy economy, and standing up for consumers have been key priorities for Rep. Lujan.

He has stood up for New Mexicans who are struggling in these difficult economic times by voting to provide tax cuts for families and small businesses, working to reform our broken health insurance system, and fighting to reform Wall Street. He has worked for the people of New Mexico's 3rd Congressional District, passing legislation that invests in scientific research at New Mexico's national laboratories, fighting for Tribal Colleges and Universities and Hispanic Serving Institutions in the America COMPETES Act, and advocating for tribal communities by improving infrastructure, education, and health care.

Rep. Lujan represents his diverse district by participating in a variety of Caucuses including the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, the Native American Caucus, and the Natural Gas Caucus.

Rep. Lujan sits on the Energy and Commerce Committee, which enables him to serve the many needs of the district which spans from San Juan County in the Northwest to Roosevelt County in the Southeast - and the treasured lands in between.

As a member of Communications and Technology Subcommittee, Rep. Lujan is working to expand broadband access in rural communities and see that new opportunities are created through increased access to the latest technological advances. From his position on the Health Subcommittee, Lujan is focusing on increased access to health care, reducing health disparities, and addressing drug abuse that has impacted too many families in New Mexico.

At the beginning of the 112th Congress, Rep. Lujan, together with co-chair Frank Wolf of Virginia, founded the bipartisan Technology Transfer Caucus to bring together members who share the goal of strengthening our economy by helping move technological innovations that are occurring at New Mexico's national labs and universities into the marketplace. Lujan will also serve as a co-chair of the bipartisan National Labs Caucus, which will raise awareness about the importance of the national labs to the long-term economic vitality and security of the nation.

At the beginning of the 113th Congress, Rep. Lujan was appointed to the House Democratic Leadership as a Chief Deputy Whip. In this position, he is promoting the Democratic agenda to create jobs and build a brighter future for all Americans. At the end of 2014, Lujan was named Chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, and will serve in this role during the 114th Congress.

Prior to his election to Congress, Rep. Lujan served as the Chairman of the New Mexico Public Regulation Commission. As a Commissioner, Rep. Lujan worked with his colleagues to develop a renewable portfolio standard to increase renewable energy production by New Mexico utilities to 20 percent of their total production by 2020 and to diversify utilities' renewable portfolios to include solar energy. On behalf of the state of New Mexico, Rep. Lujan joined his fellow Commissioners from California, Oregon, and Washington to sign onto the Joint Action Framework on Climate Change to create regional solutions to climate change.

With the New Mexico Public Regulation Commission, Rep. Lujan advocated for first responders. He worked with firefighters, the state legislature, and other officials to overhaul the New Mexico Fire Fund so that all distributions from the fund would go to improving fire services in New Mexico.

Rep. Lujan also worked to improve health care as a member of the New Mexico Public Regulation Commission by investigating the denial practices of the health insurance industry. The investigation led to the development of legislation that expanded access to insurance and closed loopholes the industry had been using to unfairly deny medical claims and void policies. Prior to that, he served as New Mexico Cultural Affairs Department's director of administrative services and chief financial officer.

Rep. Lujan earned his Bachelor's degree from New Mexico Highlands University in Business Administration.

STATE OF THE UNION for January 20, 2015, MSNBC

LENGTH: 8327 words

CHRIS MATTHEWS, MSNBC ANCHOR: Good evening. I'm Chris Matthews. Let's make some noise tonight.

By the way, in a defiant and at times soaring speech tonight, President Obama made his appeal to the American people for the final two years of his presidency. It comes at a time when Americans are feeling more optimistic, obviously, about the State of the Union itself than at any time since the president's been in office. And tonight he told the country the worst of times are behind us.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BARACK OBAMA, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: America, for all that we have endured, for all the grit and the hard work required to come back, for all the tasks that lie ahead, know this. The shadow of crisis has passed and the State of the Union is strong.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: And all night tonight you saw that difference with the vice president jumping up like a Jumping Jack every time the president spoke because he supports him, and the speaker of the House sitting there like a toadstool not moving at all for the most of the president's speech. So that was a way of sort of keeping track of what the partisanship was going on there.

Anyway, the president said the country has come back from the brink.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: In every step, we were told our goals were misguided or too ambitious. And we would crush jobs and explode deficits. Instead we've seen the fastest economic growth in over a decade, our deficits cut by two- thirds, a stock market that has doubled, and health care inflation at its lowest rate in 50 years.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: And maybe not on the level of the new deal as the phrase, the president made his case for what he coined as middle class economics, middle class economics, and outlined a proposed new tax plan that would shift more of the burden to the rich.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: And let's close the loopholes that lead to inequality by allowing the top 1 percent to avoid paying taxes on their accumulated wealth. We can use that money to help more families pay for child care and send their kids to college. We need a tax code that truly helps working Americans trying to get a leg up in the new economy. And we can achieve that together.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: It's also case by the president for more humbled foreign policy. By the way, the very phrase that George W. Bush promised us -- humility in foreign policy -- and never delivered.

Tonight the president touted his new policy with Cuba, his outreach to Iran in terms of trying to avoid them going nuclear. He called on Congress to pass a Use of Force Authorization for the war against ISIS. He called once again for the closing of Gitmo and he means that. And he spent a fair amount of time tonight calling for a renewed effort to combat climate change.

In the end he returned to that speech he gave in Boston. The soaring speech he gave back in 2004 that moved many of us who watched him.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I want them to grow up in a country that shows the world what we still know to be true. That we are still more than a collection of red states and blue states. That we are the United States of America.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: And what will no doubt be one of the most talked about moments, the president adlib a great retort when Republicans applauded him sarcastically, applauded the notion that this is his last campaign is already over.

Let's watch that little back-and-forth.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I have no more campaigns to run. My only agenda --

(APPLAUSE)

(LAUGHTER)

OBAMA: I know because I won both of them.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Well, that's how he did. He said yes, I know because I won both of them. And then he turned away -- turned away from the sarcasm making clear it was sarcasm to the Democratic side.

Anyway, joining me right now to assess the politics and the policies tonight, U.S. Congressman Ben Ray Lujan, he's from New Mexico. He's chair now of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, responsible for, of course, getting a Democratic Congress elected next time.

We also have U.S. Congressman Charlie Dent of Pennsylvania. And the "Washington Post" columnist, the great Eugene Robinson, who is staying up late with me tonight, an MSNBC political analyst as well.

Congressman Lujan, first, what did you make of the president's wonderful little repost there to the Republicans after they sort of sarcastically applauded the fact he ain't running anymore?

REP. BEN RAY LUJAN (D), NEW MEXICO: Well, look, I think as the president always does he's very in tune with everything that's being said, Chris. But tonight the president -- the president spoke very clearly to the American people about what we have to do to put the middle class first. He made it abundantly clear that trickle-down economics does not make its way to the middle class and that we need to start working on middle class economics.

That should be front and center. And I think that's what the president was trying to adjust at.

MATTHEWS: Did the president's message tonight sell, do you think, in the country? Will they get excited about minimum wage, about the $3,000 child credit, about community college being free? Those elements do you think -- and sick leave and parental leave, if you will? Will they be selling points for the DCCC as you try to win back Congress?

LUJAN: Chris, it's important to all Americans as we see the economy getting stronger, Wall Street doing better, that the middle class is still feeling the squeeze. All of the programs the president put on the table this evening are targeted at making sure that we're paying attention to what the middle class is feeling. That working families understand what's happening when child care is so expensive that it's out of reach to make it easier for them to get by.

We need to even the playing field and make sure that middle class priorities will be at the front of the table and make sure that that what we're going to be prioritizing.

MATTHEWS: Congressman Debt, what did you make of tonight overall? Do you think it will have an impact in either direction for either party?

REP. CHARLIE DENT (R), PENNSYLVANIA: Well, I thought the speech was actually more of a political statement than a governing agenda. You know, that said I think there are probably a few areas of collaboration we can work with the president on, specifically on trade, transportation, infrastructure. I think those are areas. A long-term transportation bill. I think we could -- I'd like to think we can move forward on that.

I'm a little less optimistic on tax reform. You know, if the president wants to talk about a child tax credit, tripling it, I think it has to be done in the broader complex of a more comprehensive tax reform. So those are a few things that I picked up.

On the authorization of the use of military force, I have to tell you, I was a little bit confused. I thought the president said he was operating under an existing AUMF and now he wants a new one. But if he wants an authorization of force he should come to Congress specifically and tell me us what he wants. I have not yet heard that from the president.

MATTHEWS: Let me go to Gene Robinson then.

See, that is the troubling question, is he has the authority but he wants the authority.

EUGENE ROBINSON, MSNBC ANALYST: Yes, which -- I mean, and you cannot reconcile those two things.

MATTHEWS: Right.

ROBINSON: They do not make sense together. And I got to say, Congressman Dent is right. The president did -- certainly did not lay out for the nation what it is exactly he wants. And if he --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Well, he said no boots on the ground but he had -- more forces.

ROBINSON: Well, does he really want a resolution that limits very specifically what he can do? I would doubt that he wants that.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

ROBINSON: I would bet he wants something much more open-ended.

MATTHEWS: Yes. Well, anyway, as I mentioned the president returned directly to the themes. The upbeat themes from the speech he gave up in Boston back in 2004. The speech I have to tell, right afterwards I said here's our first African-American president. Right now let's look at that.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: You know, just over a decade ago, I gave a speech in Boston where I said there wasn't a liberal America or a conservative America, a black America or a white America, but a United States of America.

Over the past six years the pundits have pointed out more than once that my presidency hasn't delivered on this vision. How ironic they say that our politics seems more divided than ever.

It's held up as proof not just of my own flaws, of which there are many, but also as proof that the vision itself is misguided, naive. That there are too many people in this town who actually benefit from partisanship and gridlock for us to ever do anything about it.

I know how tempting such cynicism may be. But I still think the cynics are wrong. I still believe that we are one people. I still believe that together we can do great things even when the odds are long.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Let me go to Congressman Lujan.

I haven't met you before but I want to ask you about that division issue. And, you know, and for the Hispanic people and what we call Anglo people and African-American people, and white people, if you will. I mean, these distinctions, we've lived with them. And do you think they're getting better? Is the president right? Because he seemed to have once again pushed the button of optimism tonight, positively.

LUJAN: Chris, I'm more optimistic than ever that we truly are the United States of America. And what the president outlying tonight was exactly what that vision is.

I'll tell you. What's concerned me all day long is the rhetoric I've heard from my Republican leadership in saying that middle class tax cuts is a nonstarter.

Look, what better place to find something that we can work on than targeting middle class tax cuts to the middle class where it's going to help them in their pockets. That's something that we should unite on. It's what brings us together as a nation and it's what the middle class deserves today.

MATTHEWS: Let me go to Congressman Dent.

You know, you represent Leigh High Valley. I don't have to tell you that. The most probably pivotal part of the state. I grew up in Pennsylvania. You always know which way to win. Check to Leigh High Valley. So I do want to hear from you about this.

Why can't the Republicans who've always supported highway bills, who's always been for infrastructure, it's good money, it's good jobs, it's construction, it's great? The smell of highway building, and we want that back again. Why can't this -- this Republican Congress get it together on building stuff again instead of just letting it rot?

DENT: Look, Chris, I agree we need to do a long term surface transportation bill, five or six years. And we have to be open to revenue sources here. We have to be very open. All of us on all sides of this equation. You know, but I'll tell you that when the president said that we need to do a transportation bill on the one hand but then he has a hard time with the Keystone Pipeline infrastructure project.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

DENT: Which has bipartisan support, I mean, I think he has to take that small step. Approve --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Is there a deal there? Is there a deal there possibly?

DENT: I think so. Look, I think there are plenty of potential agreements. We could use the Keystone Pipeline, he wants the minimum wage, we want to repeal the medical device tax.

MATTHEWS: Exciting.

DENT: I could marry up a few of the ideas and advance something that I think both -- a lot of people in both parties could embrace.

MATTHEWS: Who takes the initiative on that? How's that's happen?

DENT: Well --

MATTHEWS: These deals that I figured sitting there.

DENT: Well, look, on transportation, I would -- I think it would be OK at some point to marry up a long-term surface transportation bill with the Keystone Pipeline. Maybe -- you know, maybe we don't go to $10.10 an hour on the minimum wage but something less than that.

MATTHEWS: Sounds like (INAUDIBLE).

DENT: And tie that to repeal the medical device act which is a job-saving proposal, in my view.

MATTHEWS: You sound like the kind of Republicans I grew up with. Thank you so much for coming on.

DENT: Yes.

MATTHEWS: I mean that positively.

DENT: Thank you.

MATTHEWS: Anyway, the president also made a pitch for higher standards for politics as is practiced in D.C. or not practiced. Let's watch him here.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I served in Congress with many of you. I know many of you well. There are a lot of good people here on both sides of the aisle. And many of you have told me that this isn't what you signed up for. Arguing past each other on cable shows. The constant fundraising. Always looking over your shoulder at how the base will react to every decision.

Imagine if we broke out of these tired old patterns. Imagine if we did something different.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Well, that's what we try to do every night around here and push for deals. I am the greatest dealmaker. I really --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: It's one thing I believe in. Let's talk about race for a second.

ROBINSON: I --

MATTHEWS: I got to --

ROBINSON: Very quickly.

MATTHEWS: Sure.

ROBINSON: We'll get to race. I actually thought that was the weakest passage in his speech.

MATTHEWS: What is this?

ROBINSON: Because --

MATTHEWS: Beefy as with cable?

ROBINSON: He's not exactly the guy who goes over and hugs the guy. So -- you know, it was a good speech but I thought that was the weaker part of it.

MATTHEWS: Yes. Let me --

ROBINSON: Yes, let's talk about --

MATTHEWS: Let me tell you. Listen. I think -- I think you and I disagree. There's a real dichotomy, I think. I think 70 percent of the country really looks up to the first lady. I mean, I think there's a real acceptance of -- and she truly is African-American. She does come from (INAUDIBLE) background.

ROBINSON: Right.

MATTHEWS: Her parents are -- goes all the way back to slavery. They're the original Americans in many cases in terms of 300, 400 years. And yet you have this regular ragging on the president on race.

ROBINSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: And I see it -- as somebody wrote it the other day in "New York" magazine. And I said, all these things that certain Republican on the right do, they wouldn't do for a white Democrat. It just -- so how do you reconcile what seems to be the acceptance of the first family by maybe three quarters of the American people as African-Americans? And proof that this isn't a white country. And yet you have this grabble rousing out there against them.

I think both are true.

ROBINSON: Well, both are true. You know, there's something about the fact of the first black president irrespective of the individual, I think, that seems to have intensified some people's feelings about race in general.

MATTHEWS: Yes. I agree.

ROBINSON: And, you know, good, bad, you know, hair on fire. Whatever.

MATTHEWS: What percent? What percent?

ROBINSON: Who knows, Chris? I don't know --

MATTHEWS: Is it 10, 20?

ROBINSON: You know, some days I look at my e-mail, I think it's a high percentage. Some days -- you know.

(LAUGHTER)

MATTHEWS: You get the worst.

ROBINSON: I get the worst. And they're very ugly. I mean, you know, I get ugly, ugly things about the president, about the first lady, about the first family. You know, but-- and I get a lot of deliberately unfair and tendentious criticism that is not overtly racial but --

MATTHEWS: You can tell.

ROBINSON: Is of a tenor and of a tone that I have not seen before, and I've not seen against a white president. So.

MATTHEWS: I think a lot of these people are dying. I think they're older.

ROBINSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: I think younger people, our kids' age, are so farther ahead on this thing. And we're, I think, better off than our parents.

ROBINSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: And it's just -- it's just -- in terms of -- I'm talking about white people, I guess. But I mean, it just seems like there's something majestic about that first lady tonight. The way she comes out. And I think there's admiration for that family from three quarters of the people. And I agree that --

ROBINSON: I hope you're right.

MATTHEWS: These people that you keep hearing from.

ROBINSON: Well --

MATTHEWS: You're a magnet for this crap.

(LAUGHTER)

ROBINSON: Because you're a great writer and you write positively about the liberal -- the progressive view of race relations and they just don't like it. I guess.

Anyway, thank you. You know you're right.

Anyway, thank you, Congressman Lujan, tonight for joining us.

And Congressman Dent of Pennsylvania. I do mean that about the Leigh High Valley and your brand of Republican as some -- Bill Scranton, Republican, as Eisenhower Republicanism. I grew up with it. And Tom ridge Republicanism. It's not so far off anyway.

Coming up right now we've got the results of an online survey. We'll see what Americans thought of the president's speech tonight.

Plus, it didn't take long for Republicans to declare war on President Obama's agenda led by Senator Joni "the castrator" Ernst. It's been a wild couple of hours for the opposition party as they took to spoil the president's hot hand. Well, they tried.

And this is HARDBALL, a place for politics.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: If we're going to have arguments, let's have arguments, but let's make them debates worthy of this body and worthy of this country.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: Tonight, after a breakthrough year for America, our economy is growing and creating jobs at the fastest pace since 1999.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Well, welcome back -- welcome back to HARDBALL.

The president addressed Congress tonight, of course, on economy. His political fortunes and they're on the rise.

MSNBC's Steve Kornacki is with us now with an early look at how Americans received his speech. This is going to be fascinating. Steve.

STEVE KORNACKI, MSNBC'S "UP WITH STEVE KORNACKI": Yes, so we got some new numbers here. These are fresh numbers from an MSNBC online survey.

Let me just explain quickly what these numbers represent before we get to them and how we got then. We say online survey. You might think well, this is just whoever wants to log on to a site, saying their opinion, and you know not that scientific.

Well, what exactly is this, this is a specific sample of people. This was done in conjunction with Survey Monkey. This is a site where two million people come -- I love the name. Two million people come there and take surveys every day. We had a professional team of pollsters take a sample from Survey Monkey, a smaller sample, then they weighted it for age, for sex, for region, for all sorts of things like that. So it's a little more scientific than your standard online survey.

That said, the margin of error on this is 6.8 percent. That's a little -- you know, on the high than we normally see. So take that into account as I take you through these numbers.

First of all, the bottom line question, what did you make of the speech. Enthusiastic, 28 percent. Satisfied but not enthusiastic, 43 percent. So if you add those together basically 71 percent of the people responding here said they were at least somewhat positive in their reaction to the speech. 21 percent saying they're dissatisfied but not angry and 5 percent say they're outright angry. So, again, 26 percent on the negative side there, 71 percent on the positive side.

That's the bottom line of what we're finding in these numbers. If you look at some of the other stuff we asked about here, is the president focused on the right things by a 2-1 margin, people who watched that speech and responded to it said yes. He is focused on the right things. Is Congress, is the Republican Congress, Republicans, are they focused on the right things? Basically the inverse there, 35 percent saying they are, 61 percent saying they are on the wrong things.

If you ask about Obama's proposals, what he laid out tonight, well, unite or divide the country, a little bit of the majority there saying he would unite the country with that 54-40.

And this is an interesting one, specifically on that tax increase on the wealthy the president is talking about that he'd like to use to benefit the middle class, working class, two different ways of looking at it. Is it a bad idea because -- because the wealthy will help grow the economy? 35 percent saying yes, that's a bad idea because that -- and 63 percent saying no, it's a good idea because the wealthy can afford it.

And again that's consistent with polling we've seen down through the years. That's why this is an issue that so many -- the president himself ran in 2012. Democrats like to run on this. And I think again in laying this out tonight that's something the Democrats may very well be running on in 2016.

MATTHEWS: So just going by your margin of error, 6.8 percent, let's get back to the angry figure. The angry figure is 5 percent.

Could it be that there's less people that exist who are angry?

(LAUGHTER)

KORNACKI: The range I guess is negative 2 to 12.

MATTHEWS: I just wondered. With all these, that's 5 percent are angry and it could be off by 6.8. My god, that's good news for the president. I'm just teasing. Nothing is (INAUDIBLE).

Steve Kornacki, great work tonight.

Anyway, it's been a wild couple of hours since the president's State of the Union. Republicans have exploded into a furry of opposition and some of it has gone off the rails.

Michael Steele is chair of the RNC or was, and Howard Fineman is the global now of this international really effort by the Huffington Post to reach everywhere. Both are MSNBC political analyst.

I haven't had chance to give you a chance to broad brush. You want to start, Michael. This speech, I thought he was up.

MICHAEL STEELE, FORMER RNC CHAIRMAN: Yes.

MATTHEWS: And I think being up is -- like in our business just communicating at night. If you're down, people know that, too. He wasn't tired. He had good sleep. He looks healthy as heck.

STEELE: Yes.

MATTHEWS: He seems happy.

STEELE: He was. And I think because for this president he's feeling freed. He's lifting burdens off of his -- off of his shoulders. He's going to go in --

MATTHEWS: Is this a Janice Joplin kind of freedom?

STEELE: It's a Janice --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Nothing else to lose?

STEELE: Nothing else to lose. And when you think about it, Chris, it's almost coming full circle from 2008, particularly when he puts in a line about not -- you know, I said at one point this would be a red, white and blue America. So he'd kind of bringing all that back. And I think the president wants to move into his own space and that includes even on trade issues, for example, he knows going to upset Democrats. OK. Deal with it.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

STEELE: So this will be interesting to watch with the Congress in the Senate. The Republicans, I think, are actually in a good position, too, because now they have an opportunity to actually go out and lay out some articulate --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Why not these two sides -- OK, I'm back to my old Ronald Reagan- Tip O'Neill jag here. Why don't -- you can see the deals on the table.

STEELE: They're right there.

MATTHEWS: You can see them. Lower the corporate tax rates. Do minimum wage. Do something on infrastructure and do Keystone.

STEELE: Yes.

MATTHEWS: I know it's not purity. But it would move things along, Howard.

HOWARD FINEMAN, MSNBC POLITICAL ANALYST: Yes. And trade.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And since I'm now global editorial --

MATTHEWS: Well, you are. You've got to look at the big things. You've got to tow back that lens.

FINEMAN: It's not intergalactic.

MATTHEWS: Next.

FINEMAN: Yes. All the pieces are there. You're right, Chris. It's kind of like a puzzle. They could put all these pieces together. And as you're always saying you don't have to agree on each individual.

MATTHEWS: Right. You trade.

FINEMAN: You trade.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And all of the pieces are out there on the table to trade around.

MATTHEWS: Well, who's going to be the guy who calls everybody in and say, let's all sit down for all weekend and work out a deal.

FINEMAN: I don't know. But I would tell you one other thing. The other reason that the president was a happy man tonight is that he was able finally to say in his own mind and to the American people that he had accomplished what he'd been hired to do, which is to bring the economy reasonably back.

MATTHEWS: Talking about that couple.

FINEMAN: Yes.

MATTHEWS: The one who wrote the letters.

FINEMAN: Yes. Now what he'd proposed was a whole lot of things to kind of patch the tire in the sense that yes, we've recovered overall from the recession.

STEELE: Right. Right.

FINEMAN: But a lot -- the wages, real wages haven't increased.

STEELE: McDonald's. That's right.

FINEMAN: Which is why he said, don't worry government is going to help you with that.

STEELE: Right.

MATTHEWS: There's no rocking fiscal policy change.

FINEMAN: No.

MATTHEWS: No rocking foreign policy change.

FINEMAN: No. No, no, no.

MATTHEWS: There was no new deal-ish kind of big picture.

(CROSSTALK)

FINEMAN: This is small points to patch the tire, as I said.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And he thinks he's in a position to do that because he did the big thing -- things that he wanted to do in his mind.

MATTHEWS: Well, is that politics?

FINEMAN: The economy and health care and so on.

MATTHEWS: Well, remember, people ceased to say, you and I talked have probably talked about it 20 years ago, we've been together so long. Didn't it come out that after all that Bill Clinton did in terms of big economic growth and all that, the most popular thing he did was that leave thing he did?

FINEMAN: Yes. Family medical leave.

MATTHEWS: I mean, medical leave. That that was the one people -- that's was the one I love.

FINEMAN: That was intensely practical and tangible.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And I think that's what he trying to do here. Child care, sick leave, paid vacation, paid sick leave.

STEELE: Community --

FINEMAN: Free community college. You know, those are -- and reduction of interest rates for existing student loans. Those are tangible things that he wants to do and that he knows that poll -- all those things poll very well.

STEELE: They poll well but here is the problem.

FINEMAN: They're not going to pass to Congress.

STEELE: They're not going to pass to Congress because the bill to pay for them has not been clarified yet. And it's not just all going to come out of raising taxes on the wealthy or -- you know, increasing the capital gains tax. So I think to your question, this is where you'll have some Republicans, a John Thune maybe and a Joe Manchin on the Democrat side, who find that sweet spot for Mitch McConnell to go to the president and say we can put together a deal.

I think you're going to see, Chris, the House come along and follow behind Mitch more than people are thinking that Boehner and the House are going to be pushing a lot of agenda by themselves.

MATTHEWS: Why do you think Mitch will be a better dealmaker?

STEELE: Because I think he has a better sense of the ultimate purpose and goal here. He's looking holistically at the party, he's looking more broadly at where the party needs to be to keep the Senate in two years.

FINEMAN: I'll tell you why. Not only that. He's a bridge between the congressional Republican Party.

STEELE: Absolutely.

FINEMAN: Which is more no, no, no, we don't want to do anything and the presidential Republican Party.

MATTHEWS: He wants a president.

FINEMAN: He wants to a president.

STEELE: That's right.

FINEMAN: He wants to be the Republican leader who got a president elected.

MATTHEWS: A quick lightening question. Which party loves the presidency more? Wants it more? Covets it more?

STEELE: Republicans.

MATTHEWS: That's what I think. Don't you agree?

FINEMAN: Yes. But president --

MATTHEWS: They love the executive.

FINEMAN: But President Obama is doing a pretty good job of inhabiting the office right now.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

FINEMAN: And that's significant.

MATTHEWS: He was acting president. Has been for a long time. But I get the feeling Republicans really, really, really want that presidency.

STEELE: The executive leadership means stuff.

MATTHEWS: Yes. Commander-in-chief, too.

STEELE: It means a lot.

MATTHEWS: Anyway, Michael Steele. And thank you, Howard Fineman.

Up next, President Obama once again called for equal pay for women. And if Washington is playing catch-up on women's issues, Hollywood is already there. We're lucky enough to be joined tonight by a star outside our usual political sphere. Golden Globe's recent winner, actress Ruth Wilson from "The Affair." Watch it all the time.

This is HARDBALL. The place for politics and Ruth Davis.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: This Congress still needs to pass a law that makes sure a woman is paid the same as a man for doing the same work.

(APPLAUSE)

I mean, it's 2015. It's time.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: We're back to HARDBALL. That was of course my classic laugh there.

That was the president of course this evening closing the pay gap between men and women. A big issue in the workforce, of course. But if the country is still playing catch-up with culture and where we ought to be in values, Hollywood has made some strides.

Many new shows now on television have featured strong, independent women in key roles including Showtime's latest hit series "The Affair." A show about infidelity in the modern age.

Let's take peek.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DOMINIC WEST, "NOAH SOLLOWAY": What do you if I got my own place?

RUTH WILSON, "ALISON BAILEY": What do you mean?

WEST: Just a studio. I could use a little writing space. Finish my book. You could stay there when you come to town.

WILSON: That sounds good.

WEST: I want to move out. It could be our starter apartment.

WILSON: Move out?

WEST: Yes.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Well, that's story on "Affair" which is a really hot show. It's winning all the awards right now. It tells the complex story of an extramarital affair through the varying perspectives of the two lead players, the realistic on-screen performance of those flawed but undeniably human roles. It earned the show two Golden Globes the other day including Best Actress for Ruth Wilson who's with me right now.

She plays Alison Lockhart, a resort town waitress who's coping with the loss of her son and finds herself in an emotionally charged albeit messy romance. She's now starring on the Broadway play "Constellation" alongside Jake Gyllenhaal in New York and she joins me right now in New York, right here with me, as well as Frank Bernie, of course a very respected "New York Times" critic.

I never know what he's going to do right now. He's giving me the look.

(LAUGHTER)

You know, I want to talk about this because I really do think movies are always about today.

WILSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: Every time this movie about "MASH" wasn't about Korea. It was about Vietnam. And everything is always about today. And your shows on television now are serials. They grab you and they hold you. A two-hour movie, that's (INAUDIBLE).

Let's talk about that. Why are we -- why are we in love with the serial idea whether it's, you know, "The Good Wife" which I never miss and your show.

WILSON: I think the habits, it's changing the way people watch narratives and dramas these days. People have bigger TV screens. It's almost like a cinema experience at home. They can watch box sets over of course in their own time -- at their own time.

MATTHEWS: On demand.

WILSON: On demand. So they can watch it in their own convenience -- at their own convenience. And -- so I think that writers, and writers are getting the chance to write novelistic kind of dramas. So the character development over 10 episodes or more.

It's brilliant for actors, writers and directors to have that chance to do that. So that's why I think people are moving, dramas are moving to TV, and where they're becoming more sophisticated.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

WILSON: And the audience are incredibly sophisticated, wanting this material. This desire for it. So I think it's about how habits have changed and viewing habits are changed with box sets and on demand.

MATTHEWS: Frank, you're a -- you know the culture scene. What I'm fascinated with is women characters now are the most interesting by far.

FRANK BERNIE, NEW YORK TIMES: Yes.

MATTHEWS: Certainly Mary Crawley on "Downton Abbey" is the only really truly fascinating person in that show.

BERNIE: You mentioned -- you mentioned "The Good Wife" earlier.

MATTHEWS: Right. Right. Good. Julia Margulies. And almost Joan Fontaine, they are flashbacks to the strong women pictures. You know, Greer Garson back in the '40s. A wartime situation. What are we -- are we getting ready sort of as a country for a woman president?

(LAUGHTER)

I think -- I don't think it's a conspiracy. I just think, look, "State of Affairs."

BERNIE: Right. Right.

MATTHEWS: "Madame Secretary of State." African-American woman is president. You've got of course "Madame Secretary" where Tea Leone plays a very impressive, nice actually, secretary of state.

BERNIE: Right.

MATTHEWS: All women.

BERNIE: Well, I mean, but we've done this for a while. I mean, if memory serves me, there was a show years ago called "Commander-in-Chief" with Gina Davis, was there not? I mean, it didn't last long. It does seem like we have a concentration of them now.

MATTHEWS: Well, they didn't know how to do it then.

BERNIE: Right.

MATTHEWS: Some things are tougher now.

BERNIE: I mean, the concentration of it suggests that some -- in some ways we're getting psychologically ready for it, or at least the entertainment industry is trying to get us there. I hope they're trying to get us there because I think if you look at the number of women in the Senate, in the House of Representatives, it's nowhere near the number of strong female characters we see on TV.

WILSON: Yes.

MATTHEWS: You know, when people get together in D.C., they talk about politics, of course. But they also talk about you. And your show.

WILSON: OK.

MATTHEWS: Yes. By the way, can you switch to American now?

WILSON: No.

MATTHEWS: Why can't you --

(LAUGHTER)

MATTHEWS: When you look at a script -- he says, I'm looking at you and your leading man and every show I think of seems to have an Australian or a British actor.

WILSON: I know.

BERNIE: There's a British actor playing LBJ in "Selma." Right?

WILSON: Yes. I mean, it's almost like -- actually Jake Gyllenhaal, that acted the Brit, or the Americans are very straightforward and up front and they say what they think and they say it with passion and clarity.

MATTHEWS: It makes us boring.

WILSON: Well no. But the Brits yet lie all the time. They repress. They're naturally repressed. So they're keeping all these emotions down. And they say something else but they're hiding everything else. It sort of makes them seemingly more interesting than they are, but it's just because they're perpetually lying all time.

MATTHEWS: You know --

WILSON: There's that laugh but it's like that idea of, like, we don't -- we're not so honest with our emotion.

MATTHEWS: I think you're the it female actress right now. Actor right now.

WILSON: Thank you.

MATTHEWS: I think you're it. I think there's something going on now. I really do.

WILSON: Thank you.

MATTHEWS: When you win that Golden Globe, you could be getting some big awards this season. It's just something else.

WILSON: Thank you very much.

MATTHEWS: No, really. I think you're great. And I think that this show is great. And I watch it. I do have to say I think Julianna Margulies is unbelievable.

WILSON: She's that.

BERNIE: You should -- I hope you saw Ruth in "Luther."

WILSON: Yes. Do watch "Luther."

BERNIE: Yes, watch "Luther."

WILSON: I play a psychopath.

MATTHEWS: So I need more television. Anyway, thank you. Thank you for coming on.

WILSON: Thank you.

MATTHEWS: It's great to come over. You're on the stage tonight. And here you are.

Frank Bernie, we read you. I read you and sometimes I try to often agree with you.

Up next, President Obama's big night tonight. He's looking to go viral on the heels of tonight's address. He's launching a social media blitz on YouTube. But it's unchartered territory for presidential politics in a massive scale.

You're watching HARDBALL. The place for politics.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I've served in Congress with many of you. I know many of you well. There are a lot of good people here on both sides of the aisle. And many of you have told me that this isn't what you signed up for. Arguing past each other on cable shows. The constant fund raising. Always looking over your shoulder at how the base will react to every decision.

Imagine if we broke out of these tired old patterns. Imagine if we did something different.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: When we make rash decisions, reacting to the headlines, instead of using our heads, when the first response to a challenge is to send in our military, then we risk getting drawn into unnecessary conflicts. And neglect the broader strategy we need for a safer, more prosperous role.

That's what our enemies want us to do. I believe in a smarter kind of American leadership.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: Welcome back to HARDBALL.

President Obama is using social media, of course, and the Internet to reach audiences not reached in a live television address. He'll do an interview with YouTube personalities later this week. And we have the data on Google Searches inspired by his State of the Union address so far.

I'm joined right now by the HARDBALL roundtable tonight. We've got Mike Paul, former aide to former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, and former senator, Alfonse D'Amato. He served both those gentlemen. Lizz Winstead, co-creator of "The Daily Show" and Jonathan Alter, of course, a great historian, a "Daily Beast" columnist and an MSNBC political analyst.

So I'm looking here at the list of topics. Apparently, you know, the Google has put out what the people are looking at tonight. And they're looking at the very topics the president brought up. You know, college, I guess community college, taxes, housing, employment, education, health care, Cuba, economy, immigration and racism.

And Lizz, it seems like people now watch television with their hand doing something else. They're now looking up stuff.

LIZZ WINSTEAD, CO-CREATOR, "THE DAILY SHOW": Yes.

MATTHEWS: And they're going right -- well, we mentioned that. I know some of the earlier Google things I've looked at tonight said people wanted to know where -- what is this, the chamber? Explain where we are, I didn't know that. Who sits behind the president. You know, that kind of information.

WINSTEAD: Well, you know, it makes me think that the president was very broad strokey. And we all watched this and we're really in it, right? But when he does say, you know, a single pipeline, he doesn't say the Keystone Pipeline.

You know, when he talks about -- a trade with China but he doesn't say what it's called, I think that you need to be a little bit more specific with some of these folks who are looking it up because I'd rather have them looking up what are the pros and cons of blank rather than what is blank, right?

MATTHEWS: I love these questions like Alan Gross, the president brought him. You know, he brought him tonight. And you know, here it is. He's sitting next to the president because he was in prison in Cuban, right? So here this person writes, "Why was Alan Gross in prison in Cuba?" I mean, these are pretty basic questions.

WINSTEAD: Right.

MATTHEWS: Was he a spy? What was going on down there?

WINSTEAD: Right.

MATTHEWS: And what is the Cuban embargo? Basic information they want. How do you travel to Cuba? What's a community college? A top question here. How much does community college cost? People want a little more background. Clearly.

JONATHAN ALTER, THE DAILY BEAST: I think the important thing about this speech, some of the lines might be remembered, his tone, which was Churchill-ian when he talked about -- you know, Churchill talked about the broad sunlit up lands.

MATTHEWS: Right.

ALTER: That uplift was extremely important. It will be remembered. But I believe what will be most remembered from this over the next 10 to 15 years is the community college part of it. This is Barack Obama's G.I. bill.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

ALTER: And even though it's not going to get enacted in his term, he will always be credited for it.

MATTHEWS: Who are the people -- give me the picture of who's going to need this.

ALTER: And you've got to understand. Just in terms of new media. So the White House has done these videos every day for six years. Right. The one that was done two weeks ago where the president was on Air Force One talking about free community college was the most watched video of his entire presidency.

MATTHEWS: What was it about?

ALTER: It was outlining his free community college program. There is huge interest in this. In Tennessee which is the prototype where 90 percent of high school kids are going to enroll in this, you know, Tennessee community college program. It was more than double what was expected. There is huge demand for this.

MATTHEWS: Yes, of course. I think it's great.

ALTER: Young Americans know it's the only way they're going to be able to compete in a global economy is if they get that --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: Technical. Technical. It's not going back to photography school. I mean, that stuff. It's learning stuff that you get a job with.

ALTER: Right.

MIKE PAUL, FORMER RUDY GIULIANI AID: It's not just that because community colleges are also known as places where you complete your GED first and then you go onto college work. So I think that's one of the reasons when you're talking about the message that you had before, which is this is an inside the beltway message or is it a message for the layman, to the citizens of our country. That's the kind of answer they want.

You need to know that. There are a lot of people that still have not completed their GED. And they're not just interested to go on community college.

MATTHEWS: No.

PAUL: But you're going to help me to complete two things in one. That's a big deal.

(CROSSTALK)

ALTER: That's an important point.

WINSTEAD: And I would say --

ALTER: Nobody asked how do you pay for it? All the Republicans, well, how they're going to pay for it. They're like this is dead on arrival. It's not going to -- the bill passed unanimously in 1944, the G.I. Bill.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

ALTER: Nobody was saying how we're going to pay for it. They understood this is an investment in the future of the country. We need to do this to have a strong nation. And that's what will be interesting to see whether some of that starts to come through.

MATTHEWS: So this means to a kid, with no money from the parents, working kid from the neighborhoods, from the row houses where I grew up originally, and he now or she now knows, look, worse comes to worse, if I can get enough money just to live on, I can go to college.

WINSTEAD: Yes.

PAUL: And I can finish my high school degree, many of them are saying, and I have a lot of guilt and shame surrounding that that many of them have not finished. They might be a little older as well.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

PAUL: They're not 18 years old and going and completing by 20, for example. They might be 19, 20, 25 some of them. And they're going to finish that GED and they're going to continue and get a college degree.

MATTHEWS: And also, from both ends, macro and micro economics, macro, we need a work force. We need trained people.

PAUL: Yes.

MATTHEWS: Who can handle -- you know, like those guys, mostly guys who worked like Euro Motors and fix Mercedes. They're making a lot of money.

WINSTEAD: Yes.

MATTHEWS: And that job needs to get done.

ALTER: So other than Tennessee, Chicago is the other prototype for this. And what Rahm Emanuel did there is he blew up the old community college system. He got 70 local big employers. They took over the curriculums of these schools. One of them is IT. One of them is hospitality. One of them is health care. One of them is advanced manufacturing. And they're actually training kids for the jobs that they need.

The problem is the dropouts are off the charts. So it's like 75 percent dropout nationally. So for these schools to get the money, they have to have programs that get these kids to graduate.

MATTHEWS: All these folks are staying with us. More on this historic night.

I want to get their assessment personally on what they think is going to last from this speech. What's the impact going to be.

But the president clearly had the wind at his back tonight. And I think that Jonathan had it right. There was a tone tonight that was really more optimistic than we've seen in this whole presidency.

This is HARDBALL. Of course the place for politics.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: And everyone in this Congress who still refuses to raise the minimum wage, I say this. If you truly believe you can work full time and support a family on less than $15,000 a year, try it. If not, vote to give millions of the hardest working people in America a raise.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OBAMA: I have no more campaigns to run. My only agenda --

(APPLAUSE)

(LAUGHTER)

OBAMA: I know because I won both of them.

(APPLAUSE)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MATTHEWS: We're back with the HARDBALL roundtable, Mike, Lizz and Jonathan. And a final question.

I've got to ask you this because you're in show business here. Did you see the combination of what he threw there? First of all, he retorts with a great -- you know, adlib, puts them down. And he does it like he put his spirit and looked away. Like complete insolence in a way.

That was a little cold. I think he (INAUDIBLE). That was a little cold. And then he comes back with that incredible, irresistible smile.

WINSTEAD: Yes.

MATTHEWS: Remember that he can bring on when he wants to?

WINSTEAD: Yes.

MATTHEWS: There was a lot of action there from him in terms of drama, I thought.

WINSTEAD: I -- there is no bigger sign of confidence than silence and reaction. You know, when you can, you feel you might have done something wrong, you take a moment, you give a smile and you take it in because you know you're winning. Like that's when you know you're winning.

MATTHEWS: Control the signs. I agree with you.

WINSTEAD: Absolutely.

MATTHEWS: Jonathan, historically, you're the big picture guy here, I think, it's fair to say. The president, will this matter? Two weeks from now, three weeks from now?

ALTER: Not a huge amount. But there are a couple of interesting things.

MATTHEWS: I mean, you're sunny up. Will they still be sunny two weeks from now?

(LAUGHTER)

ALTER: It's important that he's not going into the last two years of his presidency on the defensive. He is going to enjoy it and the American public wants their president to be sunny and enjoying the job. And in the last couple of years, there were doubts about whether he liked the job. So he's sending a signal on that. And this was the real Obama who both, you know, trash talks a little bit. That's what he's like in private.

And also he has been really concerned about the original promise in Boston in 2004 that we're going to get beyond red state and blue state America. And this defense tonight --

MATTHEWS: Double down.

ALTER: Of what he called a better politics. He really wants to keep people focused on we can do better. We can have a better politics. We can have a functional Washington. That's his big message going into the last couple of years.

PAUL: You know, but the problem with that is the Republicans are weighted, right now, starting tomorrow, first thing in the morning. And they're going to start pounding him, pounding him, with messages of it doesn't touch the heart. It doesn't touch your pocket. There was a glow around the message tonight in my opinion. I think when he was in his campaign there was beyond glow. There was promise. And there was hope.

I don't think people are feeling that strong attachment emotionally to the message tonight that's going to last beyond the punches that are going to come. Because if we were able, for example, to talk about, yes, I feel it in my pocketbook, I feel it in my family, my job is a little bit better. I don't really have to worry about the stress around health care.

MATTHEWS: Yes.

PAUL: And what it costs, and if someone's going to get hurt. Those are things that are emotions and in politics, as you know, where --

(CROSSTALK)

MATTHEWS: OK. Lizz.

PAUL: From intellectual perspective.

MATTHEWS: Close it down, Lizz. Last words.

WINSTEAD: You see, what I think is he did something that was very brave when he was elected and that is make plans that take a long time in a country that has learned to put a pie in the microwave rather than cook it, bake it, watch it and see it come to fruition. And now he is seeing that pie come out of the oven, with the economy, with health care being successful. And he can take a breath and with gas prices down he is like this is what I was talking about.

And he gets to do that. So he gets to make big plans and talk about community college and bigger things. And I think that when the economy does great, and now the Republicans have come and punch hard, why do you want to cut -- why do you want tax us? They're going to say, you know what, we need to share in that.

MATTHEWS: Well, they're all views that are going to matter in the next couple of weeks.

So I want to thank our roundtable, of course, Mike Paul, Lizz Winstead and Jonathan Alter.

When we return our coverage continues with a replay of President Obama's full State of the Union address. You can watch that right here coming up.

You're watching MSNBC, the place for politics.

New Mexico: Congressman Ben Ray Luján Votes for Legislation to Prevent Veteran Suicides

LENGTH: 480 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Democratic Party has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District applauded the unanimous passage of legislation in the House last night to help prevent suicide among our nation's veterans. The Clay Hunt Suicide Prevention for American Veterans Act expands access to mental health services and increases the capacity and efficiency of VA care to address the needs of veterans returning home from war. The bill passed the House last Congress, but did not receive a final vote in the Senate before the end of last session. It was reintroduced this month with Luján as a cosponsor.

"I applaud the swift passage of this important legislation after efforts to pass it in the Senate in December fell just short. I hope the Senate will act quickly to send it to the President's desk," Luján said. "With an estimated 22 veterans committing suicide every day - more than 8,000 each year, we are facing an epidemic that we cannot ignore. The brave men and women who have sacrificed so much to protect and defend our nation, our values, and our way of life must receive the support they need and have earned. An estimated 600,000 men and women who have served in combat have traumatic brain injury, PTSD, or depression, and we must have the capacity to ensure access to the vital mental health services that can help them heal from the wounds of war. This legislation is an important step forward, and must be part of our continuing effort to honor the service and sacrifice of our nation's veterans."

The legislation, which is named in honor of Marine Corporal Clay Hunt, an Iraq and Afghanistan War veteran who was awarded the Purple Heart and dedicated suicide prevention advocate who tragically took his own life, includes a number of provisions to increase access to care. The bill:

Establishes a peer support and community outreach pilot program to assist transitioning service members with accessing VA mental health care services;
Requires the VA to create a one-stop shot, interactive website to serve as a centralized information source regarding all mental health services to veterans;
Takes steps to address the shortage of mental health care professionals by authorizing the VA to conduct a student loan repayment pilot program aimed at recruiting and retaining psychiatrists;
Requires yearly evaluations, conducted by a third party, of all mental health care and suicide prevention practices and programs at the DOD and VA to determine what is working and what is not working and to make recommendations to improve care; and

Veterans Service Organizations, including the Military Officers Association of American and Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America have voiced support for the legislation.

Funds for aviation fuel line approved

LENGTH: 236 words

The Tucumcari City Commission approved a $200,000 expenditure to make improvements to aviation fuel lines from tanks to dispensing equipment at Tucumcari Municipal Airport.

About $180,000 of the fuel line improvements will be financed through the New Mexico Department of Transportation's aviation division, with the rest coming from city funds, according to Ralph Lopez, a project manager with the city's Community Development Department.
The commission also renewed the city's five-year lease agreement with Versa Tech Industries, a paving contractor, and the Tucumcari Chamber of Commerce's $1-per-year sub-lease of office space to U. S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan. The office houses Lujan's field representative Ron Wilmot.

Lopez said transportation department inspectors had found the current fuel aviation fuel line was worn and needed to be replaced. Lopez said he found grant funds, and applied.
For the Versa Tech lease, the city will receive $1,700 per month in rent for property kn the 700 block of Campbell Avenue, and $225 a month for property on the 800 block of West Maple Street.
Patsy Gresham, executive director of the Tucumcari Chamber of Commerce, requested the continuation of the sublease for Rep. Lujan's office space. The chamber leases space from the city for its headquarters at Fifth Street and Route 66 Boulevard, and the chamber essentially donates the office for Rep. Lujan. 2014 Global Data Point.

I hope the Senate will act quickly to send it to the President's desk," Lujan said. "With an estimated 22 veterans committing suicide every day - more than 8,000 each year, we are facing an epidemic that we cannot ignore. The brave men and women who have sacrificed so much to protect and defend our nation, our values, and our way of life must receive the support they need and have earned. An estimated 600,000 men and women who have served in combat have traumatic brain injury, PTSD, or depression, and we must have the capacity to ensure access to the vital mental health services that can help them heal from the wounds of war. This legislation is an important step forward, and must be part of our continuing effort to honor the service and sacrifice of our nation's veterans."

The legislation, which is named in honor of Marine Corporal Clay Hunt, an Iraq and Afghanistan War veteran who was awarded the Purple Heart and dedicated suicide prevention advocate who tragically took his own life, includes a number of provisions to increase access to care. The bill:

* Establishes a peer support and community outreach pilot program to assist transitioning servicemembers with accessing VA mental health care services;

* Requires the VA to create a one-stop shot, interactive website to serve as a centralized information source regarding all mental health services to veterans;

* Takes steps to address the shortage of mental health care professionals by authorizing the VA to conduct a student loan repayment pilot program aimed at recruiting and retaining psychiatrists;

* Requires yearly evaluations, conducted by a third party, of all mental health care and suicide prevention practices and programs at the DOD and VA to determine what is working and what is not working and to make recommendations to improve care; and

Veterans Service Organizations, including the Military Officers Association of American and Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America have voiced support for the legislation.

HOUSE: Dems' campaign committee announces leadership team for 2016

SECTION: Congress Vol. 10 No. 9

LENGTH: 219 words

Daniel Bush, E&E reporter

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee today announced its executive leadership team for the 2016 elections, when the party will try to whittle away at the GOP's massive majority in the House.

Hayley Dierker will serve as the DCCC's chief operating officer and chief of staff. Dierker previously was chief of staff to former two-term DCCC Chairman Steve Israel (D-N.Y.), who was recently replaced as chairman by Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-N.M.) last year.

Brandon English will run the committee's digital communications and fundraising effort. English served as digital director last cycle, when the DCCC raised a record $70 million in online donations.

The DCCC also tapped Dan Sena to coordinate voter contact and serve as a senior adviser to Luján. Sena ran Sen. Tom Udall's (D-N.M.) re-election campaign last year and was political director for the Democratic Governors Association in 2012.

The committee also brought back Jackie Forte-Mackay as its chief financial officer for the 11th cycle in a row and hired Aaron Trujillo to serve as another top adviser to Luján, among other staff changes.

"These are a diverse group of experienced veterans who know how to build quality campaigns, recruit top candidates and win tough races," DCCC Executive Director Kelly Ward said in a statement.

Funds for aviation fuel line approved

Jan. 13--The Tucumcari City Commission approved a $200,000 expenditure to make improvements to aviation fuel lines from tanks to dispensing equipment at Tucumcari Municipal Airport.

About $180,000 of the fuel line improvements will be financed through the New Mexico Department of Transportation's aviation division, with the rest coming from city funds, according to Ralph Lopez, a project manager with the city's Community Development Department.

The commission also renewed the city's five-year lease agreement with Versa Tech Industries, a paving contractor, and the Tucumcari Chamber of Commerce's $1-per-year sub-lease of office space to U. S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan. The office houses Lujan's field representative Ron Wilmot.

Lopez said transportation department inspectors had found the current fuel aviation fuel line was worn and needed to be replaced. Lopez said he found grant funds, and applied.

For the Versa Tech lease, the city will receive $1,700 per month in rent for property kn the 700 block of Campbell Avenue, and $225 a month for property on the 800 block of West Maple Street.

Patsy Gresham, executive director of the Tucumcari Chamber of Commerce, requested the continuation of the sublease for Rep. Lujan's office space. The chamber leases space from the city for its headquarters at Fifth Street and Route 66 Boulevard, and the chamber essentially donates the office for Rep. Lujan.

LUJAN VOTES FOR LEGISLATION TO HELP PREVENT VETERAN SUICIDES

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 463 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District applauded the unanimous passage of legislation in the House last night to help prevent suicide among our nation's veterans. The Clay Hunt Suicide Prevention for American Veterans Act expands access to mental health services and increases the capacity and efficiency of VA care to address the needs of veterans returning home from war. The bill passed the House last Congress, but did not receive a final vote in the Senate before the end of last session. It was reintroduced this month with Lujan as a cosponsor.

"I applaud the swift passage of this important legislation after efforts to pass it in the Senate in December fell just short. I hope the Senate will act quickly to send it to the President's desk," Lujan said. "With an estimated 22 veterans committing suicide every day - more than 8,000 each year, we are facing an epidemic that we cannot ignore. The brave men and women who have sacrificed so much to protect and defend our nation, our values, and our way of life must receive the support they need and have earned. Navajo president says Republican led Congress could aid self-sufficiency goals

BYLINE: Kathy Helms navajo1@gallupindependent.com, DIN É BUREAU

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 1155 words

DATELINE: WINDOW ROCK

WINDOW ROCK -- Now that the Republicans control Congress, the Navajo Nation, which is predominantly Democrat, has an opportunity to begin working with the majority party and "really tell our story and how we'd like to be self-sufficient," Deswood Tome, policy adviser to Navajo Nation President Ben Shelly, said Saturday.

"The Republican Party very much supports self-sufficiency and it would be great for us to connect with the GOP and show them that in the long run, self-sufficiency is what we want," Tome said. "We'd like to put an agenda together on self-sufficiency and a plan and work with them to get measures passed by Congress that put us on a long-term mission to truly become self-sufficient."

Part of that plan would include amending laws that Congress has not addressed in decades, he said.

After capturing control of both houses of Congress in the November elections, the Republicans have a majority in the Senate of 54-46 and in the House of Representatives of 246-188, according to the Navajo Nation Washington Office. There are 13 new senators and 58 new members of the House of Representatives.

Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., is the new Senate Majority Leader and Harry Reid, D-Nev., retains his Democrat leadership role as the Senate minority leader. John Boehner, R-Ohio., was reelected as the House speaker and Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., remains the House minority leader.

Impact to Navajo

There were no changes in Senate representation from Arizona, New Mexico and Utah. However, Arizona has two new legislators in the House of Representatives.

Ruben Gallego, a Democrat, takes over for the retired Ed Pastor in District 7 and Martha McSally, a Republican, takes over for District 2 Democrat Ron Barber. Democrat Reps. Ann Kirkpatrick, Raúl Grijalva and Kyrsten Simena, and Republican Reps. Paul Gosar, Matt Salmon, David Schweikert, and Trent Franks, all return to the House of Representatives.

The three incumbent representatives from New Mexico -- Democrat Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham and Ben Ray Luján Jr., and Republican Rep. Steve Pearce -- are all returning.

Utah will have one new legislator coming into office. Mia Love, Republican, replaces District 4 Democrat Jim Matheson. Republican Reps. Rob Bishop, Chris Stewart and Jason Chaffetz are all returning to the House of Representatives.

Committee leverage

With the thousands of bills competing to get through Congress, tribes are low priority, Tome said, but there have been some committee assignments made in the Senate that could be favorable to Navajo.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., will be on the Indian Affairs Committee, Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee. He also will chair the Armed Services Committee.

"McCain has served on Indian Affairs for a long time throughout his career," Tome said. "He's going to continue to work on behalf of tribes from a conservative standpoint of view."

Sen. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., is on the Foreign Relations Committee, the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, the Judiciary Committee and the Special Committee on Aging.

From Utah, Republican Sen. Mike Lee is on the Armed Services Committee, Energy and Natural Resources, the Joint Economic Committee, and the Judiciary Committee. Orin Hatch, R-Utah., is on Finance Committee, Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, Judiciary Committee and the Special Committee on Aging.

On behalf of New Mexico, Democrat Sen. Tom Udall is on the Appropriations Committee, Commerce Committee, Foreign Relations Committee, Rules Committee and the Indian Affairs Committee.

Udall is the ranking Democrat on the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on the Interior, Environment and Related Agencies. The subcommittee has jurisdiction over the U.S. Forest Service, a part of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, Indian Health Service, a part of the Department of Health and Human Services, and the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, among other agencies.

Martin Heinrich, D-N. M., is on the Armed Services Committee, Energy Committee, Intelligence Committee and the Joint Economic Committee.

Much of the committee rosters from the House were not available as of the first day of the new Congress, however Rep. Rob Bishop, R-Utah., will lead the Natural Resources committee, which is the committee of jurisdiction over Indian affairs.

Appropriations

Tome, who worked at the Navajo Nation Washington Office during Presidents Albert Hale and Joe Shirley Jr.'s administrations, monitored appropriations and gave strategic input into getting projects moved into the appropriations bills.

The president of the United States puts projects into his budget and then hands it over to Congress, and then they work to pass those measures, Tome said.

"Strategically, you've got to get your projects into the president's budget, and sometimes that requires working three fiscal years to do so," he said.

With Udall being on the Appropriations Committee, he can make decisions that are advantageous to Navajo because he gets to be a part of determining how appropriations are made, Tome said.

"In bills passed by Congress, there are authorizations made, and an authorization is a dollar figure," he said. "But authorizing the money is not where the battle is. The battle is getting the money appropriated. Getting it authorized is one thing; getting it appropriated is the tougher challenge."

Energy issues

It is expected that Don Young, R-Alaska., will remain the chair of the subcommittee on Indian and Alaska Native Affairs. Paul Gosar, R-Ariz., and Raul Grijalva, D-Ariz., are also expected to be on the subcommittee.

The Senate Committee on Indian Affairs will include Chairman John Barrasso, McCain, Lisa Murkowski, John Hoeven, Mike Crapo, and new members Steve Daines, James Lankford and Jerry Moran. Democrats include Jon Tester, Maria Cantwell, Udall, Al Franken, Brian Schatz and Heidi Heitkamp.

"Senator John Barrasso being the new chairman on the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs is good for Navajo because we have a working dialogue and relationship with him," Tome said. "Navajo has always had the ability to transcend party lines and work well with members of both sides of the aisle. I'm very pleased that John Barrasso is the chair because he has shown the tribes that he is very genuine. He very much is supportive of self-sufficiency."

In 2000, Congress passed a law which gave Navajo the ability to develop the General Leasing Act provisions.

"Now, all matters of land only require Navajo government approval," Tome said. "We need more laws like that passed. I think if we could do more changes in law that regard land status and energy, we could really build a new legacy of self-sufficiency.

Congressman Don Young introduced a House bill in the 113th Congress which would have cut federal red tape on energy development for tribes.

"That bill almost got through," Tome said. "I'd like to see Don Young's bill come back alive again in this new Congress."

NM delegation adapting to power shift in Congress

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. B2

LENGTH: 763 words

As the U.S. House and Senate get back to work in Washington this month, some New Mexicans are worried about their delegation's power in the new 114th Congress.

They should be.

After all, four of the state's five members of Congress are Democrats. That creates an undeniable power problem when Republicans now control both the House and Senate. And not only is four-fifths of the delegation Democrat, but our Democrats are fairly low on the totem pole.

Sen. Tom Udall just started his second term, which makes him 47th in the 100-member Senate in terms of seniority. Not a rookie, but not exactly a high-ranking member either.

Sen. Martin Heinrich - two years into his first term - ranks 79th in Senate seniority.

So, New Mexico has two relatively junior, minority-party senators serving in a chamber where Republicans now rule and seniority is paramount. Not good.

But there is a silver lining. Udall remains on the powerful Senate Appropriations Committee and Heinrich was just appointed to the House Armed Services Committee. That means federally-dependent New Mexico still has an advocate at the table when Congress cuts checks, and our military-heavy economy has an ally on the Senate panel controlling Pentagon policy.

New Mexico will need Udall and Heinrich to make the absolute most of those roles.

On the House side, Rep. Ben Ray Luján, now in his fourth term, has finally started to acquire some seniority and rank - in the mostly powerless House Democratic caucus.

Luján is also the new chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. It's a plum assignment that should help the Hispanic congressman boost his own national profile. But the DCCC job will require a lot of heavy lifting if Luján hopes to do it well enough to get Democrats back in contention for a House takeover.

New Mexico Republicans already are licking their chops at the notion that Luján could become distracted by the national job at the expense of his district, making him vulnerable to a GOP challenge. That's wishful thinking - at least for now - and Luján assures me he can work just as hard for his constituents despite his new role. We'll see.

Michelle Lujan Grisham, a Democrat representing Albuquerque, is starting her second term in Congress. Lujan Grisham proved popular in her first term, getting herself elected president of the freshman class. Winning the popularity contest immediately raised the former Bernalillo County commissioner's profile in Washington.

Lujan Grisham has proven to be well-liked in the House, and she works hard, but that doesn't guarantee she can bring home the bacon in a Republican-controlled chamber. The congresswoman knows she has her work cut out for her.

That brings us to Rep. Steve Pearce, the delegation's lone Republican. Pearce is not only in the majority party, he's also a relatively senior member of the House, now serving his sixth term. That should bode well for Pearce - and more importantly, for New Mexico.

The problem is that he marginalized himself in the House power structure when he voted against John Boehner for speaker in the last Congress. Pearce's vote against Boehner was popular with his tea party constituents back home, but he's paid a price in Washington.

For several years, Pearce has angled - to no avail - for seats on either the House Armed Services or Energy and Commerce Committees. Boehner, who doles out assignments, gave Pearce the cold shoulder in the form of an unglamorous post on the House Financial Services Committee last Congress. Pearce, to his credit, gamely worked the role and was among the most aggressive members of the committee in questioning the administration's fiscal policies. But the former oil industry executive would rather be leading a charge for more domestic drilling on the energy committee, or working to secure New Mexico's military bases on Armed Services.

In a vote for his own political relevance, Pearce reversed course and supported Boehner for House speaker last week. It was a smart move that might already be paying dividends. I'm told Pearce has a face-to-face meeting scheduled with Boehner this week to talk about his committee assignments in the new Congress.

Last week, I asked Heinrich about the delegation's precarious power perch. He put a brave face on the situation, noting that it will require some bipartisan creativity to get things done.

"It just means there are different opportunities," Heinrich said. "You have to be nimble and you have to think about where the places are that you can get (consensus). There are always opportunities to get things done for the state."

LUJAN TO CONTINUE SERVING ON ENERGY AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE, WILL SIT ON HEALTH AND COMMUNICATIONS AND TECHNOLOGY SUBCOMMITTEES;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 441 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District announced today that he will continue to serve on the House Energy and Commerce Committee in the 114th Congress and will sit on the Health Subcommittee and the Communications and Technology Subcommittee.

"I am honored to serve on the Health Subcommittee this Congress and I am ready to dive into critical health issues that are so important to New Mexico. From increasing access to health care and reducing health disparities to addressing drug abuse that has torn apart too many families in New Mexico, a seat on this important subcommittee will strengthen my ability to advocate for my constituents and for New Mexico," Congressman Lujan said. "I also look forward to continuing my work on the Communications and Technology Subcommittee and building on my efforts to promote broadband expansion in rural communities across New Mexico and to encourage increased access to the latest technologies that have the potential to promote economic growth and new opportunities."

The Health Subcommittee has jurisdiction over public health and quarantine; hospital construction; mental health; biomedical research and development; health information technology, privacy, and cybersecurity; public health insurance and private health insurance; medical malpractice and medical malpractice insurance; the regulation of food, drugs, and cosmetics; drug abuse. In addition, the subcommittee oversees the Department of Health and Human Services; the National Institutes of Health; the Center for Disease Control, Indian Health Service; and relevant aspects of the Department of Homeland Security.

The Communications and Technology Subcommittee has responsibility over electronic communications, both interstate and foreign, including voice, video, audio, and data, whether transmitted by wire or wirelessly, and whether transmitted by telecommunications, commercial or private mobile service, broadcast, cable, satellite, microwave, or other mode. Its jurisdiction also includes emergency and public safety communications; cybersecurity, privacy, and data security; and overseeing the Federal Communications Commission, the National Telecommunications and Information Administration, and the Office of Emergency Communications in the Department of Homeland Security.

Last Congress, Lujan served on the Communications and Technology Subcommittee and the Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee.

LUJAN: REPUBLICANS' LATEST ATTACK ON ACA WILL INCREASE THE NUMBER OF UNINSURED AND INCREASE THE DEFICIT; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 426 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted today against House Republicans' latest effort to undermine the Affordable Care Act (ACA) by changing the requirement that large employers offer health coverage to employees who work 30 or more hours a week or face a penalty. The Republicans' legislation raises the threshold to 40 hours a week, which will increase the number of uninsured Americans, result in a million people losing their employer-sponsored coverage, and increase the deficit by billions of dollars.

"Nobody should want to see workers' hours reduced in an effort by businesses to avoid providing health care coverage to their workers, but this change to the ACA makes it easier for large businesses to do just that. It undermines the effort to ensure that more workers receive access to affordable, quality health care," Congressman Lujan said. "As a result of the ACA, the number of uninsured Americans has dropped to a record low, yet this bill threatens to remove one million people from their employer-sponsored coverage and move hundreds of thousands of people back to the ranks of the uninsured. And if that wasn't bad enough, this effort to dismantle a key provision of the Affordable Care Act will add $53 billion to the deficit. Clearly House Republicans' claim that they are committed to deficit reduction is nothing more than empty rhetoric."

According to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, changing the 30-hour threshold - which was designed to minimize gamesmanship by employers to avoid the law's requirement - to 40 hours, will:

* Increase the federal deficit by $53 billion over the next decade;

* Result in one million people losing their employer-sponsored coverage;

* Increase the number of uninsured by up to 500,000; and

* Increase the number of people obtaining coverage through Medicaid, CHIP, and Health Insurance Marketplaces by 500,000 to one million people.

Since the Affordable Care Act was enacted part-time workers as a share of all workers has fallen from 19.7 percent to 18.2 percent. With only about 7 percent of employees working 30 to 34 hours a week and 44 percent working 40 hours a week, this legislation makes a shift toward part-time employment much more likely, making it easier for employers to cut back hours from 40 to 39 for their workers in order to avoid having to offer health coverage.

DCCC Kicks Off 2016 Recruitment

BYLINE: By Alexis Levinson

LENGTH: 549 words

House Democrats will formally start recruitment efforts for 2016 this week, kicking off with the cycle's first meeting of new committee leadership and a weekend trip to Illinois to find prospective candidates.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee will name Rep. Denny Heck of Washington as recruitment chairman for 2016, according to information provided first to CQ Roll Call. Rep. Jan Schakowsky of Illinois will aid the DCCC's recruitment efforts as the national chairman for candidate services, and the committee's chairman, Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico, will take a leading role in seeking stellar candidates for 2016.

House Democrats took a beating in 2014, leaving the DCCC with a formidable task this cycle: It must pick up a net of 30 seats to secure the majority. But the DCCC also has plenty of offensive opportunities, with 26 House Republicans occupying districts President Barack Obama won in 2012. It's why recruitment - finding and supporting the best candidates - will be key for the DCCC.

The DCCC's newly formed, 25-member recruitment committee includes Reps. Cheri Bustos of Illinois, Lois Frankel of Florida, Joseph P. Kennedy III of Massachusetts, Ann McLane Kuster of New Hampshire, Mark Pocan of Wisconsin, Cedric L. Richmond of Louisiana, Raul Ruiz of California and Terri A. Sewell of Alabama. Reps. Steve Israel of New York and Chris Van Hollen of Maryland, both former DCCC chairmen, will also serve on the committee.

The recruitment committee will hold its first meeting Thursday morning. This weekend, Heck will travel to Illinois to meet with potential candidates in the 12th and 13th districts, currently held by Republican Reps. Mike Bost and Rodney Davis, respectively.

While the meeting marks the formal start of recruitment season, it is not the first time DCCC leadership has reached out to potential candidates this cycle. Luján made his first outreach on Nov. 17, the day he was selected to run the committee, per a DCCC official.

Republicans currently hold a historic 246-seat majority in the House; Democrats hold 188 seats. One seat is vacant, pending a special election in New York's 11th District, but Republicans are favored to win that race.

In addition to the 26 Republicans representing districts the president won, there are 23 districts where Obama took at least 48 percent of the vote. To compare, only five House Democrats occupy districts that Mitt Romney carried in 2012.

"House Democrats begin 2016 on offense as Republicans in Congress are marred in scandal and stuck defending their agenda that sells out the middle class to stack the deck for the special interests," Luján said in a statement. "Democrats will recruit strong candidates who fit their districts, can build winning campaigns and can make the case to the American people that it's time for a Congress that puts the middle class first. That starts now."

" Result in one million people losing their employer-sponsored coverage;

" Increase the number of uninsured by up to 500,000; and

" Increase the number of people obtaining coverage through Medicaid, CHIP, and Health Insurance Marketplaces by 500,000 to one million people.

Since the Affordable Care Act was enacted part-time workers as a share of all workers has fallen from 19.7 percent to 18.2 percent. With only about 7 percent of employees working 30 to 34 hours a week and 44 percent working 40 hours a week, this legislation makes a shift toward part-time employment much more likely, making it easier for employers to cut back hours from 40 to 39 for their workers in order to avoid having to offer health coverage.

Lujan to Continue Serving on Energy and Commerce Committee, Will Sit on Health and Communications and Technology Subcommittees

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 429 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District announced today that he will continue to serve on the House Energy and Commerce Committee in the 114th Congress and will sit on the Health Subcommittee and the Communications and Technology Subcommittee.

"I am honored to serve on the Health Subcommittee this Congress and I am ready to dive into critical health issues that are so important to New Mexico. From increasing access to health care and reducing health disparities to addressing drug abuse that has torn apart too many families in New Mexico, a seat on this important subcommittee will strengthen my ability to advocate for my constituents and for New Mexico," Congressman Lujan said. "I also look forward to continuing my work on the Communications and Technology Subcommittee and building on my efforts to promote broadband expansion in rural communities across New Mexico and to encourage increased access to the latest technologies that have the potential to promote economic growth and new opportunities."

The Health Subcommittee has jurisdiction over public health and quarantine; hospital construction; mental health; biomedical research and development; health information technology, privacy, and cybersecurity; public health insurance and private health insurance; medical malpractice and medical malpractice insurance; the regulation of food, drugs, and cosmetics; drug abuse. In addition, the subcommittee oversees the Department of Health and Human Services; the National Institutes of Health; the Center for Disease Control, Indian Health Service; and relevant aspects of the Department of Homeland Security.

The Communications and Technology Subcommittee has responsibility over electronic communications, both interstate and foreign, including voice, video, audio, and data, whether transmitted by wire or wirelessly, and whether transmitted by telecommunications, commercial or private mobile service, broadcast, cable, satellite, microwave, or other mode. Its jurisdiction also includes emergency and public safety communications; cybersecurity, privacy, and data security; and overseeing the Federal Communications Commission, the National Telecommunications and Information Administration, and the Office of Emergency Communications in the Department of Homeland Security.

Last Congress, Lujan served on the Communications and Technology Subcommittee and the Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee.

Lujan: Republicans' Latest Attack on ACA Will Increase the Number of Uninsured and Increase the Deficit

LENGTH: 434 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District voted today against House Republicans' latest effort to undermine the Affordable Care Act (ACA) by changing the requirement that large employers offer health coverage to employees who work 30 or more hours a week or face a penalty. The Republicans' legislation raises the threshold to 40 hours a week, which will increase the number of uninsured Americans, result in a million people losing their employer-sponsored coverage, and increase the deficit by billions of dollars.

"Nobody should want to see workers' hours reduced in an effort by businesses to avoid providing health care coverage to their workers, but this change to the ACA makes it easier for large businesses to do just that. It undermines the effort to ensure that more workers receive access to affordable, quality health care," Congressman Luján said. "As a result of the ACA, the number of uninsured Americans has dropped to a record low, yet this bill threatens to remove one million people from their employer-sponsored coverage and move hundreds of thousands of people back to the ranks of the uninsured. And if that wasn't bad enough, this effort to dismantle a key provision of the Affordable Care Act will add $53 billion to the deficit. Clearly House Republicans' claim that they are committed to deficit reduction is nothing more than empty rhetoric."

According to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, changing the 30-hour threshold - which was designed to minimize gamesmanship by employers to avoid the law's requirement - to 40 hours, will:

o Increase the federal deficit by $53 billion over the next decade;
o Result in one million people losing their employer-sponsored coverage;
o Increase the number of uninsured by up to 500,000; and o Increase the number of people obtaining coverage through Medicaid, CHIP, and Health Insurance Marketplaces by 500,000 to one million people.

Since the Affordable Care Act was enacted part-time workers as a share of all workers has fallen from 19.7 percent to 18.2 percent. With only about 7 percent of employees working 30 to 34 hours a week and 44 percent working 40 hours a week, this legislation makes a shift toward part-time employment much more likely, making it easier for employers to cut back hours from 40 to 39 for their workers in order to avoid having to offer health coverage.

Lujan Statement at the Start of 114th Congress

LENGTH: 260 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after being sworn in as a member of the 114th Congress.

"As we start the new Congress it is a tremendous honor to serve the people of New Mexico and to have the opportunity to again represent our great state. In New Mexico we are a family, and to solve the challenges we face we need to work together, from every level of government to the private sector. We all have a role to play and I will be working hard in Washington and in the district to diversify and strengthen our economy to provide more opportunities to hard-working New Mexicans.

"I will continue to be a strong advocate for our national labs by supporting important scientific research and development and fighting for funding for environmental cleanup. We must continue to invest in clean energy to take advantage of New Mexico's abundant renewable resources that can power our economy and create good jobs in our communities. And I'll continue to focus on our agricultural and traditional communities, supporting our farmers and ranchers and the products they grow that are a vital part of our economy and our culture.

"The values of family and hard work that I learned growing up in New Mexico will guide me every day as I work on behalf of the people I am honored to represent."

DCCC Chief Lujan Hits GOP On Scalise, Grimm, Farenthold Woes

SECTION: HOUSE CAMPAIGN NEWS

LENGTH: 153 words

On its website, the Washington Post (1/6, O'Keefe, 4.9M) reported that new DCCC chief Ben Ray Lujan on Monday signaled that House Democrats intend to continue "denouncing Republicans for standing by embattled House Majority Whip Steve Scalise," who "acknowledged last week that he spoke in 2002 to a white supremacist group in Louisiana that was founded by David Duke, the former Ku Klux Klan leader." Speaking with the Post, Lujan said of Republicans, "If individuals are reaching out to groups associated with David Duke, who led at one of the most intolerant times and said some of the most racist things ever said, who's been rebuked by just about everyone, that's a problem." Lujan also hit Republicans over the resignation of NY11 Rep. Michel Grimm, who stepped down after pleading guilty to tax fraud, and TX27 Rep. Blake Farenthold who "has denied [sexual harassment] allegations made by a fired former staffer."

Lujan Puts Spotlight on GOP Scandals

BYLINE: Jack Fitzpatrick

LENGTH: 217 words

In an interview, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Ben Ray Lujan (D-NM 03) focused on Republican scandals, taking aim at former Rep. Michael Grimm (R-NY 11), House Majority Whip Steve Scalise (R-LA 01), and Rep. Blake Farenthold (R-TX 27).

"My Republican colleagues are going to have to do a lot of soul-searching and see if this is a direction they want to take," he said. "Ultimately, they're going to have to answer to their constituents. Republican reliance on these groups is going to continue to be a problem for their party. If individuals are reaching out to groups associated with David Duke, who led at one of the most intolerant times and said some of the most racist things ever said, who's been rebuked by just about everyone, that's a problem."

Lujan said Democrats will be competitive in the race for Grimm's seat, but admitted it will be "a challenging time to win a special election in New York."

"We have an amazing group of individuals who live out there and a constituency that protects our streets every day," Lujan said, seemingly referring to the large portion of Staten Island that either works for or is otherwise connected to the police force and largely resents New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio's (D) response to the death of Eric Garner. Lujan, new DCCC chair, keeps up pressure on GOP on Scalise, Grimm

BYLINE: Ed O'Keefe

LENGTH: 561 words

House Democrats may face diminished ranks, but they plan to come out swinging in the early days of the new Congress by once again denouncing Republicans for standing by embattled House Majority Whip Steve Scalise (R-La.).

Scalise, the third-ranking Republican and top vote-counter, acknowledged last week that he spoke in 2002 to a white supremacist group in Louisiana that was founded by David Duke, the former Ku Klux Klan leader. Scalise called the appearance a mistake, and top GOP leaders, including Speaker John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), are standing by him. Several Republicans defended him on the Sunday morning political talk shows.

Democrats see an opening to continue drawing contrasts with Republicans, especially on racial issues. Witness comments made Monday by Rep. Ben Ray Lujan (D-N.M.), the new chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, who spoke with The Washington Post in his first interview since the Scalise incident.

"My Republican colleagues are going to have to do a lot of soul-searching and see if this is a direction they want to take," he said. "Ultimately, they're going to have to answer to their constituents. Republican reliance on these groups is going to continue to be a problem for their party. If individuals are reaching out to groups associated with David Duke, who led at one of the most intolerant times and said some of the most racist things ever said, who's been rebuked by just about everyone, that's a problem."

"With all that's happened with what's been reported with Mr. Scalise, with Michael Grimm, with Blake Farenthold -- with what's been reported with his own staff filing sexual harassment cases -- our Republicans colleagues are going to have a tough week as they start sweeping things under a rug," Lujan added.

Grimm (R-N.Y.) resigned on Monday after pleading guilty to federal tax evasion charges before Christmas. Farenthold (R-Tex.) has denied allegations made by a fired former staffer.

Lujan said that Democrats will compete in the election to succeed Grimm, but admitted: "It's going to be a challenging time to win a special election in New York."

"We're going to work and make sure that people will have a candidate from our side that's going to be honest and not be dishonest with them and that will represent the hard-working people of Staten Island," he added. "We have an amazing group of individuals who live out there and a constituency that protects our streets every day."

That comment appeared to be a subtle reference to the composition of New York's 11th Congressional District, which includes Staten Island and part of Brooklyn and is home to a large number of New York City police officers. The force has been embroiled in a fight with New York Mayor Bill DeBlasio in recent weeks over pay and benefits and his response to the death of Eric Garner, an unarmed black man who died after a police officer appeared to place him in a chokehold.

Asked if Democrats planned to recruit someone with a law enforcement background to run in the special election, Lujan would only say that the party will go after "every constituent and every voter. ... We're always stronger when more people vote."

Lujan, 42, was tapped by Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) in November for the campaign role. He's the first Latino to hold the position and is beginning his fourth term in office this week.

New Congress offers key roles for several members

BYLINE: By Michael A. Memoli, Tribune Washington Bureau

SECTION: TELEGRAPH; Pg. 8A

LENGTH: 780 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON --

WASHINGTON -- When it convenes Jan. 6, the Republican-controlled 114th Congress will bring a wave of reinforcements to enhance the clout of President Barack Obama's antagonists. But it remains to be seen whether that will set the stage for two years of continuing conflict or open a door to compromise as both parties seek to lay groundwork for the 2016 presidential race. Below is a look at eight lawmakers who will likely play key roles in the 2015 congressional battles.

The hard-liners

Ted Cruz usually grabs most of the attention, but look for Utah Republican Mike Lee to step out of that shadow as a prominent leader of the GOP's tea party wing. Lee was Cruz's chief ally in past showdowns, such as the effort to defund Obama's signature health care law and the president's executive actions on immigration this winter. Both issues are certain to be on the agenda next year.

Lee has quietly worked to develop a conservative policy platform on a range of issues. But the 114th Congress will pose a test for Lee and his conservative convictions as members of the GOP's establishment wing consider mounting a 2016 primary campaign against him in the solidly Republican state.

For Democrats, the next two years may be judged by how Elizabeth Warren, D-Mass., wields her influence with the party's progressive base. Until recently, she'd followed the traditional low-profile route for new senators. But last month's fight over a major spending bill that included 11th-hour changes to relax banking regulations prompted Warren to take a leading role against the deal.

The insiders

Ohio Sen. Rob Portman has been a behind-the-scenes player in Washington for years, including six terms in the House and two years in George W. Bush's administration as trade representative and then budget director. He was on Mitt Romney's short list for vice president in 2012 and mulled a 2016 presidential bid of his own before announcing last month he'd focus instead on running for re-election to the Senate.

Incoming Majority Leader Mitch McConnell was among the happiest at Portman's decision. Not only does it leave McConnell with one less Senate re-election seat to worry about in 2016, it also frees Portman to focus on helping the Kentuckian advance GOP priorities.

With departing Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid likely focused on his own 2016 re-election fight, Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., will take on more responsibility in managing how Democrats adjust to their new status in the minority. Schumer has worked to build bridges with the GOP even as he's been one of the party's primary political strategists.

The leaders

Kevin McCarthy, R-Calif., begins his first full term as the House majority leader in January, after Eric Cantor's shocking primary election loss in June led to a promotion for the five-term congressman. His more low-key and back-slapping style has been received warmly among the rank and file, but that doesn't mean he's been able to avoid the same internal GOP divisions that vexed his predecessor. The real test for McCarthy will be demonstrating as much heft in policy as he has in politics.

Democrat Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico is one of the only new faces in the House Democratic leadership next year, assuming the role of chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., tapped the 42-year-old amid angst within the party over its direction as Democrats start 2015 with the fewest House seats since 1949. Lujan's primary job will be helping put Democrats within striking distance to regain the House majority heading into 2016, but he'll also provide a voice for newer members at the leadership table.

The incumbents

The election gave the GOP a slightly bigger cushion in the upper chamber than many expected. That could be key, considering the 2016 election map favors Democrats because of the number of Republican incumbents facing re-election in states that Democrats have carried in recent presidential election years.

Illinois' Mark Kirk, who won the seat Obama vacated to become president, could be the most vulnerable. The Republican has forged a reputation as a moderate during multiple terms in the House and during his first term in the Senate. Whether that continues to suit state voters -- and whether he can mount a vigorous campaign as he continues to recover from a stroke -- will be keys to whether Republicans can hold their majority into the next administration.

Aside from Reid, Michael Bennet of Colorado is one of the few Democratic incumbents who will be running in a competitive state in 2016. Bennet was first appointed to the Senate and then won a tough election fight in 2010.

Kevin McCarthy, Ben Ray Luján Among Capitol Hill's Big Winners in 2014

BYLINE: By Emma Dumain

LENGTH: 1353 words

Not every member of Congress had an A+ year.

Rep. Eric Cantor, R-Va., became the first majority leader in decades to go down in a primary; Rep. Chaka Fattah, D-Pa., only barely avoided being explicitly implicated for campaign finance fraud.

New York Republican Rep. Michael G. Grimm almost had a good year: He won re-election despite a 20-count federal indictment. But then a month later he pleaded guilty to tax evasion - and just two days before the end of 2014, he announced his resignation.

Rep. Steve Scalise, R-La., freshly elected the House Majority Whip, was on track to ring in 2015 with an unblemished record from the previous 12 months, but an embarrassing revelation that he might have addressed a white supremacist group in 2002 marred an otherwise stellar score.

The list of House lawmakers who failed to hit their strides in 2014 is long and winding, made up of casualties of congressional dysfunction, those who got hit with pure bad luck and members who simply had no one to blame but themselves.

But in the holiday spirit of compassion, charity and generosity, the 218 team presents a list of 10 members - five from each side of the aisle - who were able to rise above the fray and take some "wins" while their colleagues were suffering losses.

Disclaimers apply that this list isn't exhaustive, but rather just a sampling. Here they are, Republicans first, then Democrats:

1. Rep. Kevin McCarthy, R-Calif. Fairly or not, McCarthy historically has had to stave off criticism that he's "too nice" to be in leadership. But after Cantor's primary defeat over the summer, the majority whip handily won his bid to be the next majority leader. McCarthy's elevation to that role was a clear sign that his colleagues trust him to articulate a vision for the House Republican Conference going into a presidential election year, and to find the elusive sweet spot between building consensus and keeping members in line. McCarthy gets to prove himself in the 114th Congress, helping guide the legislative agenda alongside a GOP-controlled Senate.

2. Rep. Paul D. Ryan, R-Wis.Some Republicans wanted the 2012 vice presidential nominee to run for leadership when Cantor lost his primary; others hoped he would use his influence to push for House consideration of comprehensive immigration overhaul legislation. But Ryan kept his powder dry and steered clear of any controversy and feather-ruffling in 2014. Aside from releasing his memoir-cum-policy manifesto, the lawmaker focused on one goal: Scoring his dream job in the 114th Congress of being the Ways and Means chairman. He got it.

3. Rep. Greg Walden, R-Ore. After the National Republican Campaign Committee, chaired by Walden, was out-earned and out-spent by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, there were rumblings that the Oregon Republican might face competition for a second term from some Republicans who thought they could do the job better. Walden quieted the grumblers, though, when he helped the House GOP win a larger majority in the midterms than the party had enjoyed in nearly a century. He'll have the gig now through the next cycle.

4. Rep. Jason Chaffetz, R-Utah. House GOP term limits for committee chairmen meant it was time this fall to choose a new leader for the Oversight and Government Reform Committee. It also offered a chance to choose a successor to Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Calif., whose hyper-partisan tactics had become a distraction for the party, many members agreed. Enter Chaffetz, who campaigned for the post on a promise to hold truth to power but do so on a more cooperative, bipartisan basis. He even courted Issa's longtime foe, ranking member Elijah E. Cummings, D-Md. In the most competitive Republican committee chairman race of the year, Chaffetz ultimately prevailed against three challengers.

5. Rep. Steve King, R-Iowa. King continues to be vilified by Democrats, mocked by immigrant rights activists and isolated by the House GOP establishment. In 2014, however, he was also successful in staving off any meaningful congressional overhaul of the nation's immigration system. Though Republicans reiterated again and again that King did not speak for the party's position on immigration, they also were prone to giving King exactly what he wanted when they couldn't find the votes to advance certain priorities. It was King, after all, who said in August that revised legislation to stem the child migrant crisis at the U.S.-Mexico border was "like I ordered it off the menu."

6. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M. The 42-year-old lawmaker of Latino heritage was not one of the obvious contenders for chairman of the DCCC, and his selection by Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., sent a powerful signal: One needn't be the loudest and most outwardly ambitious to secure a plum leadership assignment. For Luján, all the years of playing the happy warrior in the rank-and-file, of helping his colleagues and playing with the team, of being amiable and congenial, paid off big-time.

7. Rep. Linda T. Sánchez, D-Calif. She was already starting to take a higher profile in 2014, serving as the leadership-appointed top Democrat on the House Ethics Committee and getting a coveted seat on the special Benghazi investigative panel. Sanchez had actually thought 2016 would be the year when it all came together and it would be her turn, in the seniority system, to run for chairwoman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. That moment came much earlier, when Lujan, next in line to lead the CHC, was unexpectedly tapped to run the DCCC. Sanchez threw her hat in the ring this fall and won the job unopposed.

8. Rep. Frank Pallone Jr., D-N.J. Rep. Henry A. Waxman's retirement announcement in late-January set off a bitter, 10-month race between Pallone and Rep. Anna G. Eshoo, D-Calif., to be the ranking member on the powerful Energy and Commerce Committee. The competition was fierce, with each candidate trying to top the other with the most campaign contributions, the highest-powered endorsements and some stinging personal attacks. Pallone ultimately came out on top, but it was a nail-biter: He was only elected by his colleagues in the House Democratic Caucus by 10 votes.

9. Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, D-Md. Being the ranking member of a committee is ordinarily a thankless job when one's party has little influence over the legislative agenda, but Cummings emerged from 2014 as one of the most relevant of that league. As the top Democrat on the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, Cummings drew plaudits for his measured response to getting his microphone silenced by Issa, during a hearing; his criticism of Secret Service Director Julia Pierson - a member of the Obama administration that counts the Maryland Democrat as one of its fiercest defenders - led to bipartisan calls for her resignation. Republicans, and not only Chaffetz, learned this year that Cummings was someone worth working with and listening to.

10. Rep. George Miller, D-Calif. One of the last "Watergate babies" retired at the close of the 113th Congress, but not before securing one last legislative accomplishment: a bipartisan deal to address troubled multi-employer pension plans by allowing cuts to some benefits, via an amendment folded into the "cromnibus." It was not a popular solution among the staunch liberal's core constituency of unions and employees advocates. It also forced Miller to vote in favor of a spending bill he might not have wanted to support otherwise, given the myriad "poison pill" amendments for progressives. But, as Miller said of retirees with pension plans in peril, passage of his provision was "their last best chance."

DCCC: Michael Grimm Lied to His District

BYLINE: wbredderman

LENGTH: 380 words

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee-the official electoral arm of the House Democrats-slammed outgoing GOP Congressman Michael Grimm and his party for what it claimed were lies during his successful race against Democrat Domenic Recchia Jr. this year.

Mr. Grimm, who announced his impending resignation last night, pleaded guilty last week to a single felony tax evasion charge-despite having maintained his innocence throughout the campaign. The DCCC pounced on the reversal and alleged that that the Republican Party was just as guilty as Mr. Grimm.

"The people of Staten Island and Brooklyn were lied to throughout the last election by Michael Grimm and, sadly, Republicans let it happen despite his legal troubles," DCCC Chair Ben Ray Luján, a New Mexico congressman, said in a statement. "Before the new Congress is even sworn in, we're seeing the promises their members made to get elected being broken."

Mr. Luján argued that the special election for the vacant seat, which state law calls upon Gov. Andrew Cuomo to declare, will be an opportunity for the Democrats to pick up a seat. He acknowledged that the Staten Island and Brooklyn-based district has historically trended Republican, with Michael McMahon-whom Mr. Grimm defeated in 2010 after just two years in Washington-being the only Democrat to hold the seat in the past three decades.

Mr. Luján also alluded to the political collapse of Republican Congressman Vito Fossella, Mr. McMahon's predecessor, after a 2008 drunk driving arrest in the D.C. suburbs revealed the married representative had a secret second family.

"Now voters will finally get the choice to get out from under the shadow of the scandals that have plagued Republicans holding this seat in recent years," Mr. Luján wrote. "While this a challenging district for a Democrat in a special election, we will have a candidate who will fight to grow the middle class and ensure the deck isn't stacked in favor of the special interests and the wealthiest few."

Mr. Grimm's office did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

New Mexico: Lujan Applauds Passage of Bill to Help Prevent Veteran Suicides

LENGTH: 413 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District applauded the unanimous passage of legislation in the House today to help prevent suicide among our nation's veterans. The Clay Hunt Suicide Prevention for American Veterans Act expands access to mental health services and increases the capacity and efficiency of VA care to address the needs of veterans returning home from war.

"With an estimated 22 veterans committing suicide every day - more than 8,000 each year, we are facing an epidemic that we cannot ignore," Congressman Luján said. "The brave men and women who have sacrificed so much to protect and defend our nation, our values, and our way of life must receive the support they need and have earned. An estimated 600,000 men and women who have served in combat have traumatic brain injury, PTSD, or depression, and we must have the capacity to ensure access to the vital mental health services that can help them heal from the wounds of war. This legislation is an important step forward, and must be part of our continuing effort to honor the service and sacrifice of our nation's veterans."

The legislation, which is named in honor of Marine Corporal Clay Hunt, an Iraq and Afghanistan War veteran who was awarded the Purple Heart and dedicated suicide prevention advocate who tragically took his own life, includes a number of provisions to increase access to care. The bill:

o Establishes a peer support and community outreach pilot program to assist transitioning servicemembers with accessing VA mental health care services;
o Requires the VA to create a one-stop shot, interactive website to serve as a centralized information source regarding all mental health services to veterans;
o Takes steps to address the shortage of mental health care professionals by authorizing the VA to conduct a student loan repayment pilot program aimed at recruiting and retaining psychiatrists;
o Requires yearly evaluations, conducted by a third party, of all mental health care and suicide prevention practices and programs at the DOD and VA to determine what is working and what is not working and to make recommendations to improve care; and o Authorizes a GAO report on the transition of care for PTSD and traumatic brain injury between the DOD and VA.

New Mexico: Lujan Statement on Spending Bill

LENGTH: 335 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement tonight after voting against an omnibus appropriations bill.

"It is deeply disappointing that Congressional Republicans have used this process to pass damaging provisions that roll back critical Wall Street reforms and further undermine campaign finance rules. In addition, the measure shortchanges investments in key areas that are critical to our nation's economic competitiveness and New Mexico's future - cutting Pell Grants and providing inadequate investment to clean energy. It also plays games with funding the Department of Homeland Security, which provides critical resources to New Mexico.

"After immigration executive action was taken to increase accountability and keep families together, House Republicans have now offered their response - funding the Department of Homeland Security only through February. Rather than taking action on bipartisan comprehensive immigration reform that passed the Senate more than 500 days ago, House Republicans have charted a path that provides uncertainty for the agency tasked with protecting our homeland and securing our borders. As a result, grants to border states such as New Mexico will be in question.

"I wholeheartedly support our local governments and our labs and all those who work so hard to support our communities and our state. While there are aspects of this legislation that are good for New Mexico, middle-class families deserve better. I will always strongly advocate for the important scientific research at our labs and environmental cleanup at LANL, but New Mexicans and the American people deserve better than legislation that undermines key reforms that protect working people and the middle class and that further dismantles campaign finance rules."

'Cromnibus' not perfect, but what compromise is?

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. A6

LENGTH: 596 words

At midnight Sept. 30, 2013, the first government shutdown in 17 years kicked in. And it kicked off 16 days of unpaid work for 1.3 million federal workers, furloughs for hundreds of thousands of others, locked doors and gates for government-run facilities, and $2 billion in additional costs for U.S. taxpayers.

So everyone - especially in a state like New Mexico that is financially dependent on the feds - should breathe a big sigh of relief that we didn't go there again in 2014.

Thank you Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and Rep. Steve Pearce for supporting the ginormous $1.1 trillion spending bill, aka "Cromnibus" from "continuing resolution" and "omnibus," and sparing the state and the nation the expensive uncertainty of another shutdown.

And to Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham, New Mexicans get that it's larded up with stuff that shouldn't be there. For those like Lujan Grisham who constantly decry "gridlock" in Washington, that's called "compromise." Super conservative Ted Cruz, R-Texas, didn't like it either.

New Mexicans have seen the alternative they would face again if Luján and Lujan Grisham had prevailed. In fact they're still recovering from it. USA Today listed New Mexico as the seventh-most affected state by the 2013 shutdown - ranking "sixth in states with the most federal employees per capita and fourth in states with the most federal contractors."

Lujan Grisham said she voted to "not support legislation that puts the interests of big banks and billionaires ahead of college students who are drowning in debt, homeowners that are still facing foreclosures and retirees and working Americans who lost everything because of the reckless activities of the 'too big to fail' banks." Or, perhaps she was concerned about a potential primary election challenge from progressives and this was a safe piece of preventive political maintenance since the legislation was expected to pass and had President Obama's support.

Fortunately, others took a more statesmanlike approach because this bill, for all its flaws, has some important things for New Mexico. Specifically:

$37 million compensation for untaxable federal land

$320 million for the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant

$643 million for Sandia and Los Alamos national laboratories

$185 million for LANL cleanup

$14.8 million for technology transfer (a key to the state's economic independence)

$23.3 million for Cannon Air Force Base

$34 million for Kirtland Air Force Base

A portion of $159.1 billion for the Department of Veterans Affairs, including $209 million for rural health programs and $5 million for additional oversight

$88 million for three water settlements and

A portion of $526 million for wildfire suppression and prevention.

Pearce explains that while there was plenty in the bill not to like, "it will provide certainty and stability for New Mexico businesses through the next fiscal year." Udall emphasizes the "critical funding for New Mexico, to sustain our national labs and military bases, continue recovery at WIPP, and ensure New Mexicans can count on basic government services like schools, public safety, roads and so many other needs."

That's what compromise is. It's not perfect, but it gets the job done.

As Washington Post columnist Ruth Marcus points out, "real-world legislating requires a horrific amount of nose-holding." By its sheer size there are undoubtedly pretty smelly things in the Cromnibus, and those can and should be revisited in future cycles.

But none stink as badly as paying a government $2 billion to do nothing while workers sit home without paychecks.

Local Cuban community welcomes change; NM delegation has varied reactions

BYLINE: MIKE BUSH AND OLIVIER UYTTEBROUCK JOURNAL STAFF WRITERS

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A8

LENGTH: 797 words

The news came as a surprise Wednesday, then quickly spread throughout Bernalillo County's Cuban community: President Barack Obama was on TV talking about normalizing relations with Cuba.

Obama's message, and that of Cuban President Raul Castro, were generally well-received but not without reservations among the county's 3,200-person Cuban community.

"I can hardly wait to talk with my brothers in Miami," said Tony Lipiz. "Right now I'm just trying to digest everything."

One of the motivations behind the day's developments was the freeing of Alan Gross, an American contractor held in a Cuban prison for five years. Three Cubans who had been convicted of spying in this country will also be released in exchange for a U.S. spy held in Cuba for nearly 20 years. Cuba will also release 53 political prisoners.

"The biggest winners in this deal are Alan Gross and the 53 political prisoners," said Ivan Avila, another Cuban emigre who came to this country 12 years ago and now operates a plumbing business in Albuquerque. "President Obama has the duty to protect American citizens, and he probably saved Alan Gross' life."

As for the Cuban spies, he said they deserve to be incarcerated, but noted that they have served 20 years behind bars.

Lipiz, who conducts surveys on mental health issues for an international company, said his main concern is the economic embargo the United States imposed on Cuba shortly after the 1959 revolution.

"My people are suffering because of it, not the Cuban government," he said.

Initially, Lipiz - who left Cuba in 1961 when he was 14 - favored the embargo as a way to get the Cuban regime to become more democratic. But after a visit to the island in 2000, he realized that it was an abject failure.

The latest developments likely will put more money into the Cuban economy, because more U.S. tourists will visit the island and Cuban-Americans will be able to send more money to relatives in Cuba, said Nelson Valdés, a Cuban scholar and professor emeritus at the University of New Mexico.

The changes increase the amount of money Americans can send to Cubans from $500 to $2,000 every three months.

New Mexico's congressional delegation took a varied view of Obama's announcement, with Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., hailing the president's announcement, Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., condemning it and other delegation members somewhere in between.

Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., also cheered Obama's action, while Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., took a wait-and-see approach. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., voiced mixed feelings about it, and Pearce said it set "an extremely dangerous precedent."

"This is a sea change as our nation is finally embarking on a 21st-century approach with Cuba, one that will open opportunities for New Mexicans and other American interests in Cuba," said Udall, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "American citizens are the best diplomats of our values and I hope their future interactions shine through with the Cuban people."

Pearce said he "welcomed" Gross's release but not the president's policy shift on Cuba.

"The new policy toward Cuba gives the Castro regime an influx of American dollars and eases travel restrictions but does nothing to ensure real democratic reforms or stymie human rights abuses by the Castro brothers," Pearce said.

Heinrich called the news "a welcome change of course in our nation's relationship with Cuba."

"I support the administration's decision to abandon an outdated Cold War policy of isolation that failed to advance America's goal of an open and free society for the Cuban people," Heinrich said.

Luján said he hopes Cuba lives up to the expectation the U.S. will have in the new relationship.

"It is important that we examine our relationship with Cuba and ensure that we are charting a path that encourages political freedom and respect for human rights," Luján said. "The changes President Obama outlined today must be met with concrete steps from the Cuban government that achieve these goals. I look forward to reviewing the President's plan in greater detail to assess the full impact it will have on the United States and Cuba."

Lujan Grisham said the president's announcement gave her reason for optimism, but also concern.

"I am optimistic about the shift toward restoring diplomatic relations with Cuba and moving away from a policy that has failed on so many levels," Lujan Grisham said.

"However, I am concerned about the release of Cubans, who were convicted in American courts, as a condition or precursor to improving relations between the U.S. and Cuba," she said. "I worry about the message that may send to other state actors around the world that are looking for leverage against the U.S."

NM getting billions from spending bill; 'Critical funding' includes labs, bases, water projects

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: FRONT PAGE; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 915 words

WASHINGTON - A massive spending bill sent to President Barack Obama over the weekend contains billions of dollars for New Mexico.

The legislation contains money for Los Alamos and Sandia national laboratories, an ongoing repair effort at the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant, military bases, technology transfer, water projects, counties with large tracts of untaxable federal lands and other programs.

Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, both New Mexico Democrats, said they voted for the legislation passed by the Senate late Saturday because it contained money critical for New Mexico, even though they objected to provisions that altered rules for campaign finance and Wall Street banks.

"This bill includes critical funding for New Mexico, to sustain our national labs and military bases, continue recovery at WIPP, and ensure New Mexicans can count on basic government services like schools, public safety, roads and so many other needs," Udall said. "I'm extremely disappointed that this bill also contains measures that weaken campaign finance laws and roll back Wall Street reforms. Our duty is to the American people - not Wall Street billionaires and bankers. But at the end of the day, I could not risk a government shutdown."

Heinrich said the good in the bill outweighs the bad.

Democratic Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham both voted against the spending bill, while Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., voted for it.

Lujan Grisham said the bill was fatally flawed.

"While I hoped to vote for a clean spending bill that invests in New Mexico priorities like Sandia National Laboratories and Kirtland Air Force Base, I could not support legislation that puts the interests of big banks and billionaires ahead of college students who are drowning in debt, homeowners that are still facing foreclosures and retirees and working Americans who lost everything because of the reckless activities of the 'too big to fail' banks," Lujan Grisham said.

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., said the bill was a mixed bag but that its positive provisions were worthy of support, including language to slash the IRS budget and prevent new fees for farmers and ranchers whose stock grazes on federal land.

"Passing the spending bill as our last order of business this year was critical, as it will provide certainty and stability for New Mexico businesses through the next fiscal year," Pearce said.

Some of the money contained in the bill, according to Udall's office:

Payment in lieu of taxes program for counties: The PILT program is funded at $442 million. The total will be divided according to a formula determined by the U.S. Department of the Interior. Last year, New Mexico counties received $37 million.

WIPP, Los Alamos and Sandia National Laboratories: The bill provides $320 million for WIPP, including the administration's original funding request of $220 million. The additional $100 million is designated for cleanup from a radiological accident and equals the estimate DOE has provided for FY15 recovery activities at WIPP.

B61 Life Extension Project at Sandia and Los Alamos: At $643 million, the bill fully funds the B61 LEP for fiscal year 2015 and supports recent job increases at Sandia.

LANL cleanup: $185 million

Technology Transfer: $4.8 million for technology transfer efforts at the Department of Defense, $2.1 million above the president's request, plus an additional $10 million for a regionally focused technology transfer innovation pilot program, requested by Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M.

Military/Defense Cannon Air Force Base:

$23.3 million for a Squadron Operations Facility; Kirtland Air Force Base High Energy Laser: $14 million for high energy laser research initiatives, $1.0 million more than the president's request; Kirtland Air Force Base Operationally Responsive Space Office: $20 million. Department of Veterans Affairs (VA):

The legislation includes a total of $159.1 billion, $1.8 billion above the enacted fiscal year 2014 level.

Rural Health: $209 million to help address new costs related to the Veterans Access, Choice, and Accountability Act of 2014, including hiring medical staff, expanding facility capacity and allowing rural veterans to seek care outside the VA system.

Oversight: To help address problems related to the "wait list" scandal at the VA in New Mexico and elsewhere, Udall pushed for additional funding for the VA Office of Inspector General. The agreement increases funding by $5 million over the fiscal year 2014 level to provide the resources necessary to continue the office's audits of hospital appointment scheduling and lapses in patient care.

Water Projects: Navajo-Gallup Project: The bill provides $81 million for the construction of the Navajo-Gallup Water Supply Project and the historic 2010 Navajo Nation Water Rights Settlement Agreement. The project will supply water to the eastern portion of the Navajo Nation, the southwestern portion of the Jicarilla Apache Nation and the city of Gallup, serving the future water needs of approximately 250,000 people.

Other Water Settlements: Aamodt: $3 million; Taos Pueblo: $4 million; Middle Rio Grande: The bill includes a provision encouraging development and implementation of the Water Acquisition Program along the Middle Rio Grande and San Juan Chama Projects and the Physical Habitat Restoration and Management efforts along the San Acacia Reach consistent with fiscal year 2014 activities.

Wildfire suppression and prevention: Hazardous fuels reduction activities, $526 million total nationwide.

NM Senators support massive spending bill, NM House Dems oppose

BYLINE: Michael Coleman, JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: INSIDE THE BELTWAY

LENGTH: 3157 words

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. -- A massive spending bill that cleared the Senate late Saturday passed with reluctant support from New Mexico's two Democratic senators who objected to provisions that altered rules for campaign finance and Wall Street banks.

Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, both New Mexico Democrats, voted for the spending bill that funds New Mexico's national laboratories, the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant, military bases, technology transfer, water projects and other programs. On Thursday, Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., voted for the bill while Reps. Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham both voted against it. The bill is now on its way to President Obama's desk.

"This bill includes critical funding for New Mexico, to sustain our national labs and military bases, continue recovery at WIPP, and ensure New Mexicans can count on basic government services like schools, public safety, roads and so many other needs," Udall said. "I'm extremely disappointed that this bill also contains measures that weaken campaign finance laws and roll back Wall Street reforms. Our duty is to the American people--not Wall Street billionaires and bankers. But at the end of the day, I could not risk a government shutdown. I will continue to do everything I can as a member of the Appropriations Committee to get Congress back to working for New Mexico and the American people. The American people deserve better than this broken process. They deserve a Congress that works--that is open and deliberate--not last-minute deals and gimmicks for special interests. We cannot keep getting in just under the wire."

Heinrich said the good in the bill outweighs the bad.

"New Mexico relies heavily on these federal investments," Heinrich said. "Home to military bases, national laboratories, and WIPP, our state serves the nation in many ways. Federal dollars help fund critical education initiatives, infrastructure projects, and other vitally important economic drivers. This appropriations bill also includes funding for our nation's response to the Ebola epidemic and to combat the threat presented by the terrorist organization ISIL.

"It is very unfortunate that the bill includes policy riders that I don't support and which don't belong there - including ones that would open the floodgates to special interest money influencing our elections and undo reforms to protect hardworking taxpayers from having to again bailout Wall Street bankers," Heinrich added. "I'm also opposed to an amendment that could compromise the retirement security of hardworking families. While I'm pleased that PILT funding was included in the final package, I will continue to push for full and dedicated funding for Secure Rural Schools to give our counties the budget certainty they need. Our economy desperately needs long-term stability. It doesn't need another government shutdown. We must continue to work together and be willing to compromise in order to get things done for the American people and New Mexico."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., said the bill was fatally flawed in her mind.

"While I hoped to vote for a clean spending bill that invests in New Mexico priorities like Sandia National Laboratories and Kirtland Air Force Base, I could not support legislation that puts the interests of big banks and billionaires ahead of college students who are drowning in debt, homeowners that are still facing foreclosures and retirees and working Americans who lost everything because of the reckless activities of the too big to fail banks," Lujan Grisham said. "As America continues to recover, everyone needs a shot at recovery - not just big business. New Mexico families are still struggling to recover from the last taxpayer-funded bailout of Wall Street - they should not have to shoulder that burden ever again. The bill jeopardizes national security, cuts earned retiree pension benefits, and rolls back campaign finance rules that opens the door to even more special-interest spending during political campaigns. These provisions put special interests above working-class Americans and have no business in appropriations legislation."

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., said the bill was a mixed bag but that its positive provisions were worthy of support.

"Passing the spending bill as our last order of business this year was critical, as it will provide certainty and stability for New Mexico businesses through the next fiscal year," said Congressman Steve Pearce. "Compelling points and arguments existed on both sides of the issues, and I found there were reasons to vote for and against the bill. The bill provides several provisions to protect jobs and restrict crippling federal regulation and overreach, including protecting farmers and ranchers from new grazing fees on BLM and Forest Service lands. The legislation also reduces federal bureaucracy. It decreases funding for the IRS by $346 million. The bill restricts overreach of the federal government, including a provision to prevent the EPA from passing a rule to regulate lead content in ammunition, and it prohibits the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers from requiring Clean Water Act permits for agricultural ponds and ditches."

"We have increased funding for the National Institutes of Health and provided $45.2 billion for VA medical services, including $7 billion for mental health care, $133 million for suicide prevention and $7 billion for homeless veterans' assistance."

"I commend Chairman Calvert and Chairman Rogers for putting forth legislation that includes vital provisions that will help Western communities grow and prosper," said Pearce. "The bill increases funding for hazardous fuels reduction to help Western communities prevent catastrophic wildfires. It also prevents the administration from implementing new fees on oil and gas producers who create jobs and ensure stable energy prices for middle-class families. The bill cuts full-time employees at the EPA to the lowest level in 25 years, and rejects $66 million requested by the President to implement even more economically devastating regulations. The bill will give statewide conservation efforts a chance to succeed by preventing a listing of the sage grouse, which would have severe economic consequences for many Western communities."

"Last, but not least, the bill fully funds the Payments in Lieu of Taxes Program (PILT) that so many Western communities rely on for their everyday needs. The provisions in this bill are essential in providing certainty and the potential for economic growth in the West."

Reps. Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham, both Democrats, voted against the bill.

"It is deeply disappointing that Congressional Republicans have used this process to pass damaging provisions that roll back critical Wall Street reforms and further undermine campaign finance rules," Lujan said. "In addition, the measure shortchanges investments in key areas that are critical to our nation's economic competitiveness and New Mexico's future - cutting Pell Grants and providing inadequate investment to clean energy. It also plays games with funding the Department of Homeland Security, which provides critical resources to New Mexico.

"After immigration executive action was taken to increase accountability and keep families together, House Republicans have now offered their response - funding the Department of Homeland Security only through February. Rather than taking action on bipartisan comprehensive immigration reform that passed the Senate more than 500 days ago, House Republicans have charted a path that provides uncertainty for the agency tasked with protecting our homeland and securing our borders. As a result, grants to border states such as New Mexico will be in question.

"As America continues to recover, everyone needs a shot at recovery - not just big business. New Mexico families are still struggling to recover from the last taxpayer-funded bailout of Wall Street - they should not have to shoulder that burden ever again. The bill jeopardizes national security, cuts earned retiree pension benefits, and rolls back campaign finance rules that opens the door to even more special-interest spending during political campaigns. These provisions put special interests above working-class Americans and have no business in appropriations legislation."

New Mexico funding in the bill includes (this information is from the office of Udall, who sits on the Senate Appropriations Committee:

Some of the money included for New Mexico, according to Udall's office:

Payment in-lieu of taxes program (PILT):

With $70 million included in a defense bill, which is also before Congress this week, and $372 million in the omnibus, the PILT program is funded at $442 million. The total will be divided according to a formula determined by the U.S. Department of the Interior. Last year, New Mexico counties received $37 million.

WIPP, Los Alamos and Sandia National Laboratories:

The bill provides $320 million for WIPP, including the administration's original funding request of $220 million. The additional $100 million is designated for cleanup from the radiological accident and equals the estimate DOE has provided for FY15 recovery activities at WIPP.

B61 Life Extension Project:

$643 million. Both Los Alamos and Sandia national labs are instrumental in carrying out this program, which maintains our nation's nuclear weapons stockpile while allowing for the eventual elimination of the nation's largest warhead, the B83. The bill fully funds the B61 LEP for FY15 and supports recent job increases at Sandia.

LANL Cleanup: $185 million

LANL Recapitalization: $22.7 million for 10 projects plus $23 million for TA-55 Reinvestment Project Phase II and III LANL

Sandia National Laboratory Recapitalization:

$30.8 million for seven projects.

Technology Transfer:

$4.8 million for technology transfer at the Department of Defense, $2.1 million above the president's request, plus an additional $10 million for a regionally focused technology transfer innovation pilot program, requested by Senator Udall. The pilot will facilitate public-private ventures between the Department of Defense research and development centers and regionally focused technology incubators.

MILITARY/DOD

-Cannon Air Force Base:

$23.3 million for a Squadron Operations Facility

-Kirtland Air Force Base High Energy Laser:

$14 million for high energy laser research initiatives, $1.0 million more than the president's request for work that will partially be done at KAFB.

-Kirtland Air Force Base Operationally Responsive Space (ORS) Office:

$20 million. The ORS Office is responsible for responsive space capabilities that enable rapid deployment of military resources all around the world. Senator Udall secured this funding, not included in the president's request, to complete the development, launch, and operations of the ORS mission and to support the integration of ORS approaches across the space capabilities in the Air Force.

DOD Starbase Funding:

$25 million increase in funding for STARBASE, a Science, Technology, Engineering, and Math (STEM) education program for fifth graders. Senator Udall succeeded in pushing for this civilian program that provides 25 hours of engaging STEM instruction. The technology-rich military environment allows students to experience first-hand "real-world" application of STEM skills. The DoD STARBASE Program creates an unequaled bridge between the U.S. Military and STEM education with local school students that is achieved through strong civilian/military leadership involvement, state of the art curriculum and technology, nation-wide program standardization, a complete understanding of military culture, and assured access to military installations.

Department of Veterans Affairs (VA):

The legislation includes a total of $159.1 billion, $1.8 billion above the enacted fiscal year 2014 level.

VA Medical Services:

$45.2 billion - providing care and treatment for approximately 6.7 million veterans. This includes: $7.2 billion in mental health care services; $133 million in suicide prevention activities; $229 million for traumatic brain injury treatment; $7.4 billion in homeless veterans treatment, services, housing, and job training; and $250 million in rural health initiatives.

Rural Health:

$209 million to help address new costs related to the Veterans Access, Choice, and Accountability Act of 2014 including hiring medical staff, expanding facility capacity, and allowing rural veterans to seek care outside the VA system.

Oversight:

To help address issues related to the "wait list" scandal at the VA in New Mexico and elsewhere, Udall pushed for additional funding for the VA Office of Inspector General. The agreement increases funding by $5 million over the fiscal year 2014 level to provide the resources necessary to continue the Office's audits of hospital appointment scheduling and lapses in patient care. The legislation also includes language directing the VA Office of the Medical Inspector to report on problems or deficiencies in the implementation of its recommendations, and on any violations of law by VA employees.

Advance Funding for Veterans Medical Programs:

$58.7 billion in advance fiscal year 2016 funding for the VA. This funding will provide for medical services, medical support and compliance, and medical facilities, and ensure that our veterans have continued, full access to their medical care.

Water Projects:

-Navajo-Gallup Project: The bill provides $81 million for the construction of the Navajo-Gallup Water Supply Project and the historic 2010 Navajo Nation Water Rights Settlement Agreement. The project will supply water to the eastern portion of the Navajo Nation, the southwestern portion of the Jicarilla Apache Nation and the city of Gallup, serving the future water needs of approximately 250,000 people.

Other Water Settlements

-Aamodt: $3 million

-Taos Pueblo: $4 million

-Middle Rio Grande: The bill includes a provision encouraging development and implementation of the Water Acquisition Program along the Middle Rio Grande and San Juan Chama Projects and the Physical Habitat Restoration and Management efforts along the San Acacia Reach consistent with fiscal year 2014 activities.

Bureau of Reclamation:

-Westwide Drought Response: $50 million for drought response in Western states.

-Reauthorization of Reclamation States Emergency Drought Relief Act of 1991 (a provision from Udall's drought bill, the New Mexico Drought Relief Act of 2014)

-Secure Water Act: The bill increases the authorization from $200 million to $300 million (also a provision from Udall's New Mexico Drought Relief Act of 2014).

-Rural Water Projects: $31 million in discretionary funds for rural water projects, which may be used to fund projects like the Eastern New Mexico-Ute Pipeline.

The bill also includes specific funding for the following Bureau of Reclamation projects in New Mexico:

-Carlsbad Project: $4,139,000

-Middle Rio Grande Project: $22,735,000

-Rio Grande Project: $5,406,000

-Rio Grande Pueblos Project: $650,000

-Tucumcari Project: $34,000

-Navajo Indian Irrigation Project: $3.4 million

ARMY CORPS OF ENGINEERS

-Tribal Partnership Program: $2.5M

-Espanola Valley, Rio Grande & Tributaries: $300,000

-Rio Grande Basin, NM, CO, and TX (Sec. 729): $300,000

-Middle Rio Grande Flood Protection, Bernalillo to Belen: $276,000

-Abiquiu Dam: $2,794,000

-Cochiti Lake: $3,587,000

-Conchas Lake: $2,794,000

-Galisteo Dam: $1,150,000

-Inspection of Completed Environmental Projects: $30,000

-Inspection of Completed Works: $654,000

-Jemez Canyon Dam: $1,392,000

-Rio Grande Endangered Species Collaborative Program: $2,492,000

-Santa Rosa Dam and Lake: $1,594,000

-Scheduling Reservoir Operations: $330,000

-Two Rivers Dam: $797,000

-Upper Rio Grande Water Operations Model Study: $1,289,000

WILDFIRE SUPPRESSION AND PREVENTION

-Hazardous fuels reduction activities: $526 million total nationwide

-Wildfire suppression: $1.394 billion total for the Forest Service and DOI to respond to forest fires.

-Aircraft acquisition to enhance firefighting capacity, effectiveness: $65 million

-Collaborative Forest Landscape Restoration Fund: $40 million for ecological restoration treatments of forests. This helps prevent fires and make healthy watersheds. Two projects in New Mexico are ongoing (Zuni Mountain and Jemez Mountains)

Financial Services and General Govermment:

-Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board (PCLOB): $7.5 million for the PCLOB to help ensure that federal laws and policies related to terrorism appropriately consider privacy and civil liberties. These resources, $4.4 million more than the fiscal year 2014 enacted level, will enable the PCLOB to pursue its mission without delay.

-10 temporary federal judgeships extended for one year, including one in New Mexico.

-Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP): $375 million, $8 million above the fiscal year 2014 enacted level. This includes $245 million for the High Intensity Drug Trafficking Areas (HIDTA) Program and $93.5 million for the Drug-Free Communities program.

-State, Local, and Tribal Law Enforcement: $2.3 billion to support state and local law enforcement with the tools they need to fight violent crime and gangs. This amount is $55 million more than the fiscal year 2014 level and includes funding for key grant programs, such as $376 million for Byrne Justice Assistance Grants, $180 million for Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS) hiring grants, $430 million for Violence Against Women Act programs and $252 million for juvenile justice and mentoring grants.

-Heroin Crisis: $7 million to fund a new program within the COPS Office for anti-heroin task forces. Competitive grants will be awarded for drug enforcement, including investigations and activities related to the distribution of heroin or unlawful diversion and distribution of prescription opioids. The agreement calls on the DOJ to take the lead in convening experts in the law enforcement, medical, public health and educational fields to develop a comprehensive government-wide solution for this crisis. The bill also provides funding for OJP grant programs available to state and local governments for residential drug treatment ($10 million), prescription drug monitoring ($11 million), and drug courts ($41 million).

-Funding for 35 new Immigration Judge Teams allowing Executive Office for Immigration Review to adjudicate up to 39,000 more cases annually.

Congressional Votes for New Mexico the Week of 12/05 - 12/11/2014

BYLINE: by TARGETED NEWS SERVICE, Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 2300 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 -- There were nine key votes in the House this week; the House held a total of 13 roll call votes in the week ending Thursday. There were four key votes in the Senate, which held a total of seven roll call votes. The most important House vote was to pass a bill to fund discretionary government programs in fiscal 2015; the most important Senate vote was to approve an end to debate on the fiscal 2015 military spending bill.

In addition to roll call votes, the House and Senate also took action on several measures by voice vote. The Senate also passed the Intelligence Authorization Act (H.R. 4681), sponsored by Rep. Mike J. Rogers, R-Mich., to authorize appropriations for intelligence and intelligence-related activities in fiscal 2014 and fiscal 2015; passed a resolution (H.J. Res. 130), sponsored by Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky., to make continuing appropriations for discretionary government spending until Dec. 13; passed the FOIA Improvement Act (S. 2520), sponsored by Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, D-Vt., to improve the Freedom of Information Act; and passed the Federal Information Security Modernization Act (S. 2521), sponsored by Sen. Thomas R. Carper, D-Del., to provide for reforms of federal information security.

The House passed the Senator Paul Simon Water for the World Act (H.R. 2901), sponsored by Rep. Earl Blumenauer, D-Ore., to improve the U.S. government's ability to improve access to safe drinking water, sanitation, and hygiene to the world's poorest individuals; passed the Clay Hunt Suicide Prevention for American Veterans Act (H.R. 5059), sponsored by Rep. Timothy J. Walz, D-Minn., to require annual evaluations of the military's mental health care and suicide prevention programs; passed the Feed the Future Global Food Security Act (H.R. 5656), sponsored by Rep. Christopher H. Smith, R-N.J., to authorize the Feed the Future Initiative to sustainably reduce global poverty and hunger in developing countries; and passed the Coast Guard Authorization Act for Fiscal Years 2015 and 2016 (S. 2444), sponsored by Sen. Mark Begich, D-Alaska, to authorize Coast Guard appropriations.

Here's a look at how area members of Congress voted over the previous week.

HOUSE VOTES:

House Vote 1:

CALIFORNIA WATER SUPPLIES: The House has passed the California Emergency Drought Relief Act (H.R. 5781), sponsored by Rep. David G. Valadao, R-Calif. The bill would direct the Commerce Secretary and Interior Secretary to allow California's Central Valley Project and State Water Project to provide maximum possible levels of water to businesses and municipalities in the state's Central Valley, without threatening the region's endangered species. Valadao said the measure was necessary because, given the state's historic drought, people in the Central Valley are facing a severe water shortage, and increasing water supplies would relieve some of those shortage. A bill opponent, Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., called it an effort by a small number of Central Valley farmers to override the open process of allocating water supplies, with resulting risks for California's fisheries and cities that also rely on the water supplies. The vote, on Dec. 9, was 230 yeas to 182 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 2:

CHESAPEAKE BAY RESTORATION EFFORTS: The House has passed the Chesapeake Bay Accountability and Recovery Act (S. 1000), sponsored by Sen. Mark R. Warner. The bill would require the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to prepare a crosscut budget for restoration activities in the Chesapeake Bay watershed by various federal government agencies. A supporter, Rep. Robert J. Wittman, R-Va., said the budget would "ensure federal dollars currently spent on bay restoration activities produce results and ensure that we are coordinating how restoration dollars are being spent." The vote, on Dec. 10, was unanimous with 416 yeas.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 3:

INSURANCE AGAINST TERRORIST ATTACKS: The House has passed the Terrorism Risk Insurance Program Reauthorization Act (S. 2244), sponsored by Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y. The bill would extend the government's Terrorism Insurance Program through 2021 and decrease the government's share of compensation that would be paid out for losses incurred by an insurer due to a terrorist attack, in stages, to 80 percent of the portion of the amount of losses that exceeds the insurer's deductible. It would also exempt end-users of commodities from a provision of the Dodd-Frank financial reform law that imposes margin requirements for swap transactions involving the future price of commodities. A supporter, Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Texas, said the terrorism risk program added stability and certainty to the insurance and construction markets, while the end-user exemption would help businesses and family farmers manage price risks for commodities they use. The vote, on Dec. 10, was 417 yeas to 7 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 4:

FUNDING INTELLIGENCE PROGRAMS: The House has concurred in the Senate amendment to the Intelligence Authorization Act (H.R. 4681), sponsored by Rep. Mike J. Rogers, R-Mich., to authorize appropriations for intelligence and intelligence-related activities in fiscal 2014 and fiscal 2015, with most details of the appropriations classified. Rogers said the range of growing threats to the U.S., including the Islamic State group and countries such as Russia and China that seek to change the international order at the expense of the U.S., led to the bill's small increase in spending to more effectively counter those threats and preserve national security. The vote, on Dec. 10, was 325 yeas to 100 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 5:

TSA TECHNOLOGY, INVENTORY MANAGEMENT: The House has concurred in the Senate amendment to the Transportation Security Acquisition Reform Act (H.R. 2719), sponsored by Rep. Richard Hudson, R-N.C. The bill would require the Transportation Security Administration to develop a long-term plan for managing its inventory, deploying technology systems, and increasing the transparency of the agency's spending. Hudson said the bill "will save significant tax dollars by forcing TSA to make thoughtful, informed decisions about what kinds of technology to deploy in our nation's airports. We simply cannot afford to see TSA repeat the mistakes of the past which have resulted in technologies such as 'puffer machines' and body scanners being pulled out of airports prematurely and others sitting idle in warehouses, never to see the light of day." The vote, on Dec. 10, was unanimous with 425 yeas.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 6:

AIR TRAVEL SECURITY ADVISORY COMMITTEE: The House has concurred in the Senate amendment to the Aviation Security Stakeholder Participation Act (H.R. 1204), sponsored by Rep. Bennie G. Thompson, D-Miss. The bill would order the establishment of an Aviation Security Advisory Committee, made up of various representatives from the aviation industry, to give input to the Transportation Security Administration on the design of air travel security programs. Thompson said the amendment improved upon the bill's effort to give industry stakeholders a venue for working with the TSA to adopt appropriate security strategies, ensuring that the TSA considers stakeholders it proposes security changes for the aviation industry. The vote, on Dec. 10, was 416 yeas to 5 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 7:

TAX DEDUCTIONS FOR CHARITABLE GIVING: The House has rejected the Supporting America's Charities Act (H.R. 5806), sponsored by Rep. Dave Camp, R-Mich. The bill would make permanent the tax deduction for property given to conservation groups by individuals and corporations and increase the allowed tax deduction for food donations to 15 percent of a taxpayer's annual income. Camp said the measure sought to increase charitable giving an help charities better serve those in need, including the hungry and disabled. An opponent, Rep. Sander M. Levin, D-Mich., said expanding the tax deductions without paying for them would add $11 billion to the government's debt. The vote, on Dec. 11, was 275 yeas to 149 nays, with a two-thirds majority required for approval.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 8:

OMNIBUS SPENDING BILL: The House has concurred in the Senate amendment to the Consolidated and Further Continuing Appropriations Act (H.R. 83), sponsored by Del. Donna M. Christensen, D-Virgin Islands. The bill would provide $1.013 trillion of appropriations for the military and other discretionary government programs in fiscal 2015, while funding the Homeland Security Department until Feb. 27, 2015. A supporter, Rep. Mike Rogers, R-Mich., said it "prevents a costly and damaging government shutdown while making good government funding and policy decisions and reining in regulatory overreach." An opponent, Rep. David E. Price, D-N.C., criticized the bill for allowing the wealthy to contribute more to political campaigns, encouraging dangerous activity in the financial sector by erasing reforms adopted in the Dodd-Frank law, and failing to adequately fund immigration enforcement agencies and also creating the risk of a funding lapse at Homeland Security in February. The vote, on Dec. 11, was 219 yeas to 206 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 9:

EXPANDING JOHN MUIR HISTORIC SITE: The House has passed the John Muir National Historic Site Expansion Act (H.R. 5699), sponsored by Rep. George Miller, D-Calif. The bill would authorize the Interior Secretary's purchase of 44 acres of land in Martinez, Calif., in order to expand the John Muir Historic Site. Miller said the acquisition would improve the site by creating new recreational opportunities for visitors, without any cost to the government, because the funds to buy the 44 acres have been raised from local donors. The vote, on Dec. 11, was 361 yeas to 39 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

SENATE VOTES:

Senate Vote 1:

REGULATING NUCLEAR POWER: The Senate has confirmed the renomination of Jeffery Martin Baran to serve as a commissioner on the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for a term ending in mid-2018. Baran, who joined the NRC in October, had served as a senior Democratic staffer on the House Energy and Commerce Committee. A supporter, Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., called Baran a "very qualified individual" who had shown his ability to successfully work with Democrats and Republicans in his time on the House committee. The vote, on Dec. 8, was 52 yeas to 40 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 2:

LABOR RELATIONS BOARD MEMBER: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Lauren McGarity McFerran to serve as a member of the National Labor Relations Board for a five-year term. A supporter, Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, cited McFerran's experience as a senior staffer on the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions. Harkin praised McFerran for her "deep knowledge of labor law. She is an incredibly talented lawyer. She is a person of sterling integrity and strong character. She will be a great asset to the Board." The vote, on Dec. 8, was 54 yeas to 40 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 3:

TVA BOARD MEMBER: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Virginia Tyler Lodge to serve as a member of the Tennessee Valley Authority's board of directors for a term ending in May, 2019. Lodge, a business consultant, previously served as a commissioner on the Tennessee Department of Human Service. A supporter, Sen. Bob Corker, R-Tenn., noted that Lodge has promised to recuse herself from any decisions at TVA that involve a potential conflict of interest with the proposal by a Democratic real estate developer to complete TVA's partly-built Bellefonte nuclear power plant in Alabama. The vote, on Dec. 9, was 86 yeas to 12 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 4:

DEBATING MILITARY SPENDING BILL: The Senate has approved a cloture motion to end debate on the House amendment to the Carl Levin and Howard P. 'Buck' McKeon National Defense Authorization Act (H.R. 3979), sponsored by Rep. Lou Barletta, R-Pa. The bill would authorize $577.1 billion of funding for the Defense Department in fiscal 2015, including $63.7 billion for combat efforts in Iraq, Afghanistan, and Syria. It would also fund programs to prevent sexual assault in the military and introduce a prescription drugs copayment in health insurance plans for military members. A supporter, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said along with providing necessary funding for the military, a package of land legislation included in the bill would protect wild, scenic, and historic places while opening up other federal lands for beneficial development. The vote, on Dec. 11, was 85 yeas to 14 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate approves National Park status for Manhattan Project, Valles Caldera; President's signature will finalize new parks' status.

BYLINE: Arin McKenna

SECTION: AROUND THE AREA

LENGTH: 483 words

The senate has just voted 89-11 to approve the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA), which includes public lands legislation creating the Manhattan Project National Historical Park (MPNHP) and granting National Park Preserve status to the Valles Caldera National Preserve (VCNP).

Both pieces of legislation have been years in the making. Senators Tom Udall, Martin Heinrich, and former Sen. Jeff Bingaman were sponsors of both pieces of legislation. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan helped sponsor the MPNHP legislation in the House.

On Dec. 11. Heinrich delivered statements supporting the inclusion of several public lands bills in the NDAA. He stated,

"None of this would be possible were it not for years of effort and support from the local communities that helped craft these bills. Thanks to their work, New Mexico's critical public land based economic engine will continue to grow in the energy, tourism, sporting and recreation sectors."

Lujan also issued a statement after the House passage of the bill last week, stating that establish the MPNHP

"...helps preserve this story so that future generations can understand both the positive and negative impacts of the project. In addition, it will recognize all those who played a key role in the national security of our nation and see that they will not be forgotten."

Lujan also stated that obtaining National Park Preserve status for the Valles "will have a positive impact on New Mexico's economy while protecting our majestic lands and encouraging public access to our great outdoors.

The MPNHP legislation creates a national park with units in Los Alamos, Oak Ridge, Tenn. and Hanford, Wash. It is likely to take two years or more for the Department of Energy and the National Park Service to work out the logistics of the park and for a management plan to be drawn up.

Udall and Bingaman first proposed national park status for the Valles in 2010, believing that national park status provided the best means of protecting the preserve. The legislation they sponsored maintains a model very similar to that currently in place at the preserve, allowing for recreational activities, hunting, fishing and grazing.

The enabling legislation that created the VCNP in 2000 mandated that the preserve be self-sufficient by 2015, with a possible extension until 2020. Failing that, the trust managing the preserve would be dissolved and the management of the 89,000-acres preserve would be transferred to the U.S. Forest Service.

The board voted in September to request the five-year extension of the trust, since the trust has failed to achieve financial sustainability. The newly passed legislation makes that unnecessary.

The Columbine-Hondo area was also designated as wilderness as part of the public lands package in the NDAA.

Pres. Barak Obama has 10 days to either sign or veto the bill.

LUJAN STATEMENT ON SPENDING BILL

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 316 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, D.C.

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement tonight after voting against an omnibus appropriations bill.

"It is deeply disappointing that Congressional Republicans have used this process to pass damaging provisions that roll back critical Wall Street reforms and further undermine campaign finance rules. In addition, the measure shortchanges investments in key areas that are critical to our nation's economic competitiveness and New Mexico's future - cutting Pell Grants and providing inadequate investment to clean energy. It also plays games with funding the Department of Homeland Security, which provides critical resources to New Mexico.

"After immigration executive action was taken to increase accountability and keep families together, House Republicans have now offered their response - funding the Department of Homeland Security only through February. Rather than taking action on bipartisan comprehensive immigration reform that passed the Senate more than 500 days ago, House Republicans have charted a path that provides uncertainty for the agency tasked with protecting our homeland and securing our borders. As a result, grants to border states such as New Mexico will be in question.

"I wholeheartedly support our local governments and our labs and all those who work so hard to support our communities and our state. While there are aspects of this legislation that are good for New Mexico, middle-class families deserve better. I will always strongly advocate for the important scientific research at our labs and environmental cleanup at LANL, but New Mexicans and the American people deserve better than legislation that undermines key reforms that protect working people and the middle class and that further dismantles campaign finance rules."

New Mexico: Congressman Ben Ray Luján Applauds Passage of Bill to Help Prevent Veteran Suicides

LENGTH: 436 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Democratic Party has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District applauded the unanimous passage of legislation in the House today to help prevent suicide among our nation's veterans. The Clay Hunt Suicide Prevention for American Veterans Act expands access to mental health services and increases the capacity and efficiency of VA care to address the needs of veterans returning home from war.

"With an estimated 22 veterans committing suicide every day - more than 8,000 each year, we are facing an epidemic that we cannot ignore," Congressman Luján said. "The brave men and women who have sacrificed so much to protect and defend our nation, our values, and our way of life must receive the support they need and have earned. An estimated 600,000 men and women who have served in combat have traumatic brain injury, PTSD, or depression, and we must have the capacity to ensure access to the vital mental health services that can help them heal from the wounds of war. This legislation is an important step forward, and must be part of our continuing effort to honor the service and sacrifice of our nation's veterans."

The legislation, which is named in honor of Marine Corporal Clay Hunt, an Iraq and Afghanistan War veteran who was awarded the Purple Heart and dedicated suicide prevention advocate who tragically took his own life, includes a number of provisions to increase access to care. The bill:

Establishes a peer support and community outreach pilot program to assist transitioning service members with accessing VA mental health care services;
Requires the VA to create a one-stop shot, interactive website to serve as a centralized information source regarding all mental health services to veterans;
Takes steps to address the shortage of mental health care professionals by authorizing the VA to conduct a student loan repayment pilot program aimed at recruiting and retaining psychiatrists;
Requires yearly evaluations, conducted by a third party, of all mental health care and suicide prevention practices and programs at the DOD and VA to determine what is working and what is not working and to make recommendations to improve care; and Authorizes a GAO report on the transition of care for PTSD and traumatic brain injury between the DOD and VA.

Veterans Service Organizations, including the Military Officers Association of American and Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America have voiced support for the legislation.

New Mexico : Congressman Ben Ray Luján and Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham Respond to Senate Report on CIA Interrogation Program

LENGTH: 222 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Democratic Party has issued the following news release:

Today, Congressman Ben Ray Luján (NM-03) and Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham (NM-01) released statements in response to the Senate Intelligence Committee report on the C.I.A. Interrogation Program.

Following the release of the report Congressman Lujan issued the following statement:

"Torture is an affront to our American values. The CIA's efforts to mislead and conceal the full nature of their actions were deplorable. The Senate Intelligence Committee report is an important step toward understanding and rectifying the mistakes that were made during this period in our nation's history. We must ensure that this is never allowed to happen again."

Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham issued the following statement following in response to the Senate Intelligence Committee report:

"I am repulsed by the details of the torture that the C.I.A. used against detainees. These actions go against our moral fabric as a nation that values human rights. Perhaps just as disturbing is the lengths to which the C.I.A. is going to discredit the reports of torture, rather than committing to changing the culture that led to these egregious acts of violence."

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. -- The U.S. House is preparing to vote on a massive $1.1 trillion dollar spending bill that includes money to pay for government programs ranging from the Department of Veterans Affairs to the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant near Carlsbad to New Mexico water projects, but the legislation is running into opposition.

Congressional Democrats, including at least some of those from New Mexico, object to provisions included in the bill that would change campaign finance rules, reduce pensions for some Americans and alter the Dodd-Frank banking regulations that were designed to curtail Wall Street abuses.

Because a temporary spending measure to fund the government expires today, the omnibus bill must either be approved by Congress this week or funding must be temporarily extended - or the government will shut down.

Sen. Tom Udall, a New Mexico Democrat who sits on the Senate Appropriations Committee, said he is leaning toward a vote for the 1,600-page bill, which includes provisions he helped negotiate for WIPP, Sandia and Los Alamos National Laboratories, rural counties whose tax bases are adversely affected by untaxable federal lands, and other spending measures.

Udall denounced the so-called "riders" on the bill dealing with campaign finance, Dodd-Frank and other provisisons, as well as threats by lawmakers to shut down the government over disagreements with the president's executive action on immigration.

"This bill includes funding for programs that I fought for - to sustain jobs at New Mexico's labs and bases, to continue cleanup from the radiation release at WIPP, and ensure New Mexico counties have funding they count on for schools, public safety, roads and so many other daily services," Udall said. "I'm extremely disappointed that Congress has become so broken that it would hold vital regular funding hostage in order to pass gimmicks that unleash special interest spending to influence political campaigns and that weaken laws protecting our financial system."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., is similarly dismayed by the additions, her spokesman said today. However, the congresswoman is gratified that the bill continues to ban horse slaughter funding for human consumption, an initiative she worked on during this Congress. Lujan Grisham is unsure how she will vote on the bill.

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., has been posting highlights of the bill on his Facebook page, touting reductions in federal spending and in staffing at the Environmental Protection Agency, as well as big new money for veterans. A Pearce spokesman said the congressman is leaning "favorably" toward the bill, but is still examining the details.

Sen. Martin Heinrich, a Democrat, has some concerns about the bill but plans to vote for it when it comes from the House, his spokeswoman said this morning.

It remains unclear where Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., stands on the spending bill today. I'll update this when I hear back from his office.

The omnibus spending bill finances the day-to-day operations of every Cabinet department except Homeland Security through Sept. 30, 2015. House Republicans are using Homeland Security funding as way to force a debate on President Obama's recent decision to suspend deportation for as many as 5 million illegal immigrants.

Some of the money included for New Mexico, according to Udall's office:

Payment in-lieu of taxes program (PILT):

With $70 million included in a defense bill, which is also before Congress this week, and $372 million in the omnibus, the PILT program is funded at $442 million. The total will be divided according to a formula determined by the U.S. Department of the Interior. Last year, New Mexico counties received $37 million.

WIPP, Los Alamos and Sandia National Laboratories:

The bill provides $320 million for WIPP, including the administration's original funding request of $220 million. The additional $100 million is designated for cleanup from the radiological accident and equals the estimate DOE has provided for FY15 recovery activities at WIPP.

B61 Life Extension Project:

$643 million. Both Los Alamos and Sandia national labs are instrumental in carrying out this program, which maintains our nation's nuclear weapons stockpile while allowing for the eventual elimination of the nation's largest warhead, the B83. The bill fully funds the B61 LEP for FY15 and supports recent job increases at Sandia.

LANL Cleanup: $185 million

LANL Recapitalization: $22.7 million for 10 projects plus $23 million for TA-55 Reinvestment Project Phase II and III LANL

Sandia National Laboratory Recapitalization:

$30.8 million for seven projects.

Technology Transfer:

$4.8 million for technology transfer at the Department of Defense, $2.1 million above the president's request, plus an additional $10 million for a regionally focused technology transfer innovation pilot program, requested by Senator Udall. The pilot will facilitate public-private ventures between the Department of Defense research and development centers and regionally focused technology incubators.

MILITARY/DOD

-Cannon Air Force Base:

$23.3 million for a Squadron Operations Facility

-Kirtland Air Force Base High Energy Laser:

$14 million for high energy laser research initiatives, $1.0 million more than the president's request for work that will partially be done at KAFB.

-Kirtland Air Force Base Operationally Responsive Space (ORS) Office:

$20 million. The ORS Office is responsible for responsive space capabilities that enable rapid deployment of military resources all around the world. Senator Udall secured this funding, not included in the president's request, to complete the development, launch, and operations of the ORS mission and to support the integration of ORS approaches across the space capabilities in the Air Force.

DOD Starbase Funding:

$25 million increase in funding for STARBASE, a Science, Technology, Engineering, and Math (STEM) education program for fifth graders. Senator Udall succeeded in pushing for this civilian program that provides 25 hours of engaging STEM instruction. The technology-rich military environment allows students to experience first-hand "real-world" application of STEM skills. The DoD STARBASE Program creates an unequaled bridge between the U.S. Military and STEM education with local school students that is achieved through strong civilian/military leadership involvement, state of the art curriculum and technology, nation-wide program standardization, a complete understanding of military culture, and assured access to military installations.

Department of Veterans Affairs (VA):

The legislation includes a total of $159.1 billion, $1.8 billion above the enacted fiscal year 2014 level.

VA Medical Services:

$45.2 billion - providing care and treatment for approximately 6.7 million veterans. This includes: $7.2 billion in mental health care services; $133 million in suicide prevention activities; $229 million for traumatic brain injury treatment; $7.4 billion in homeless veterans treatment, services, housing, and job training; and $250 million in rural health initiatives.

Rural Health:

$209 million to help address new costs related to the Veterans Access, Choice, and Accountability Act of 2014 including hiring medical staff, expanding facility capacity, and allowing rural veterans to seek care outside the VA system.

Oversight:

To help address issues related to the "wait list" scandal at the VA in New Mexico and elsewhere, Udall pushed for additional funding for the VA Office of Inspector General. The agreement increases funding by $5 million over the fiscal year 2014 level to provide the resources necessary to continue the Office's audits of hospital appointment scheduling and lapses in patient care. The legislation also includes language directing the VA Office of the Medical Inspector to report on problems or deficiencies in the implementation of its recommendations, and on any violations of law by VA employees.

Advance Funding for Veterans Medical Programs:

$58.7 billion in advance fiscal year 2016 funding for the VA. This funding will provide for medical services, medical support and compliance, and medical facilities, and ensure that our veterans have continued, full access to their medical care.

Water Projects:

-Navajo-Gallup Project: The bill provides $81 million for the construction of the Navajo-Gallup Water Supply Project and the historic 2010 Navajo Nation Water Rights Settlement Agreement. The project will supply water to the eastern portion of the Navajo Nation, the southwestern portion of the Jicarilla Apache Nation and the city of Gallup, serving the future water needs of approximately 250,000 people.

Other Water Settlements

-Aamodt: $3 million

-Taos Pueblo: $4 million

-Middle Rio Grande: The bill includes a provision encouraging development and implementation of the Water Acquisition Program along the Middle Rio Grande and San Juan Chama Projects and the Physical Habitat Restoration and Management efforts along the San Acacia Reach consistent with fiscal year 2014 activities.

Bureau of Reclamation:

-Westwide Drought Response: $50 million for drought response in Western states.

-Reauthorization of Reclamation States Emergency Drought Relief Act of 1991 (a provision from Udall's drought bill, the New Mexico Drought Relief Act of 2014)

-Secure Water Act: The bill increases the authorization from $200 million to $300 million (also a provision from Udall's New Mexico Drought Relief Act of 2014).

-Rural Water Projects: $31 million in discretionary funds for rural water projects, which may be used to fund projects like the Eastern New Mexico-Ute Pipeline.

The bill also includes specific funding for the following Bureau of Reclamation projects in New Mexico:

-Carlsbad Project: $4,139,000

-Middle Rio Grande Project: $22,735,000

-Rio Grande Project: $5,406,000

-Rio Grande Pueblos Project: $650,000

-Tucumcari Project: $34,000

-Navajo Indian Irrigation Project: $3.4 million

ARMY CORPS OF ENGINEERS

-Tribal Partnership Program: $2.5M

-Espanola Valley, Rio Grande & Tributaries: $300,000

-Rio Grande Basin, NM, CO, and TX (Sec. 729): $300,000

-Middle Rio Grande Flood Protection, Bernalillo to Belen: $276,000

-Abiquiu Dam: $2,794,000

-Cochiti Lake: $3,587,000

-Conchas Lake: $2,794,000

-Galisteo Dam: $1,150,000

-Inspection of Completed Environmental Projects: $30,000

-Inspection of Completed Works: $654,000

-Jemez Canyon Dam: $1,392,000

-Rio Grande Endangered Species Collaborative Program: $2,492,000

-Santa Rosa Dam and Lake: $1,594,000

-Scheduling Reservoir Operations: $330,000

-Two Rivers Dam: $797,000

-Upper Rio Grande Water Operations Model Study: $1,289,000

WILDFIRE SUPPRESSION AND PREVENTION

-Hazardous fuels reduction activities: $526 million total nationwide

-Wildfire suppression: $1.394 billion total for the Forest Service and DOI to respond to forest fires.

-Aircraft acquisition to enhance firefighting capacity, effectiveness: $65 million

-Collaborative Forest Landscape Restoration Fund: $40 million for ecological restoration treatments of forests. This helps prevent fires and make healthy watersheds. Two projects in New Mexico are ongoing (Zuni Mountain and Jemez Mountains)

Financial Services and General Govermment:

-Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board (PCLOB): $7.5 million for the PCLOB to help ensure that federal laws and policies related to terrorism appropriately consider privacy and civil liberties. These resources, $4.4 million more than the fiscal year 2014 enacted level, will enable the PCLOB to pursue its mission without delay.

-10 temporary federal judgeships extended for one year, including one in New Mexico.

-Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP): $375 million, $8 million above the fiscal year 2014 enacted level. This includes $245 million for the High Intensity Drug Trafficking Areas (HIDTA) Program and $93.5 million for the Drug-Free Communities program.

-State, Local, and Tribal Law Enforcement: $2.3 billion to support state and local law enforcement with the tools they need to fight violent crime and gangs. This amount is $55 million more than the fiscal year 2014 level and includes funding for key grant programs, such as $376 million for Byrne Justice Assistance Grants, $180 million for Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS) hiring grants, $430 million for Violence Against Women Act programs and $252 million for juvenile justice and mentoring grants.

-Heroin Crisis: $7 million to fund a new program within the COPS Office for anti-heroin task forces. Competitive grants will be awarded for drug enforcement, including investigations and activities related to the distribution of heroin or unlawful diversion and distribution of prescription opioids. The agreement calls on the DOJ to take the lead in convening experts in the law enforcement, medical, public health and educational fields to develop a comprehensive government-wide solution for this crisis. The bill also provides funding for OJP grant programs available to state and local governments for residential drug treatment ($10 million), prescription drug monitoring ($11 million), and drug courts ($41 million).

-Funding for 35 new Immigration Judge Teams allowing Executive Office for Immigration Review to adjudicate up to 39,000 more cases annually.

LUJAN STATEMENT ON SPENDING BILL; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 322 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement tonight after voting against an omnibus appropriations bill.

"It is deeply disappointing that Congressional Republicans have used this process to pass damaging provisions that roll back critical Wall Street reforms and further undermine campaign finance rules. In addition, the measure shortchanges investments in key areas that are critical to our nation's economic competitiveness and New Mexico's future - cutting Pell Grants and providing inadequate investment to clean energy. It also plays games with funding the Department of Homeland Security, which provides critical resources to New Mexico.

"After immigration executive action was taken to increase accountability and keep families together, House Republicans have now offered their response - funding the Department of Homeland Security only through February. Rather than taking action on bipartisan comprehensive immigration reform that passed the Senate more than 500 days ago, House Republicans have charted a path that provides uncertainty for the agency tasked with protecting our homeland and securing our borders. As a result, grants to border states such as New Mexico will be in question.

"I wholeheartedly support our local governments and our labs and all those who work so hard to support our communities and our state. While there are aspects of this legislation that are good for New Mexico, middle-class families deserve better. I will always strongly advocate for the important scientific research at our labs and environmental cleanup at LANL, but New Mexicans and the American people deserve better than legislation that undermines key reforms that protect working people and the middle class and that further dismantles campaign finance rules."

Lujan Statement on Senate Intelligence Committee Report on CIA Interrogation Program

LENGTH: 129 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján released the following statement today on the recently released report from the Senate Intelligence Committee on the CIA's detention and interrogation program.

"Torture is an affront to our American values. The CIA's efforts to mislead and conceal the full nature of their actions were deplorable. The Senate Intelligence Committee report is an important step toward understanding and rectifying the mistakes that were made during this period in our nation's history. We must ensure that this is never allowed to happen again."

NM Dems condemn CIA torture; Delegation's lone Republican says report may endanger U.S. troops

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: FRONT PAGE; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 804 words

WASHINGTON - Sen. Martin Heinrich, a New Mexico Democrat who sits on the Senate Intelligence Committee, said a newly released report on CIA torture is disturbing but he hopes the 528-page document will help prevent similar actions from ever happening again.

Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., called the CIA interrogation techniques brutal. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., said she was repulsed by them. Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M, condemned the release of the report and said it may put U.S. troops in greater danger overseas.

"I don't think any normal person can read some of the descriptions (of torture) and not be disturbed, but the main question is, how do we learn from this and make sure this doesn't happen in the future?" Heinrich said told the Journal on Tuesday.

The report, released after a five-year investigation by the Senate Intelligence Committee and over the objections of CIA officials,details techniques that agency operatives sometimes employed during interrogations of suspected terrorists after 9/11 as well the agency's dishonesty in trying to downplay or cover up the activity. In some cases, detainees were deprived of sleep for as long as a week, and were sometimes threatened with death. CIA medical staff approved "rectal feeding" or "rectal hydration" - a technique that the CIA's chief of interrogations described as a way to exert "total control over the detainee."

CIA Director John Brennan issued a statement arguing that the techniques produced "intelligence that helped thwart attack plans, capture terrorists, and save lives."

"The intelligence gained from the program was critical to our understanding of al-Qaida and continues to inform our counterterrorism efforts to this day," Brennan said.

Pearce, the New Mexico congressional delegation's only Republican, said the report's release could bring harm to U.S. troops abroad.

"I am concerned that the release of this report will jeopardize the lives of our troops that are in harm's way and engaged directly in conflict overseas," Pearce said. "The decision by Senate Democrats, supported by the White House, to release the report today has possibly endangered the lives of thousands of troops and federal employees abroad."

Heinrich, who along with other Democrats on the committee had pushed for the report's public release for months, said the torture itself jeopardized American troops.

"What put Americans at risk was that it became known we had tortured people and the CIA had engaged in conduct that clearly was inflammatory and it was used as a recruiting tool - not the fact that we are owning up to it," he said. "That's a very important distinction. If we're going to be the world's leading voice against extremism and terror, then we have to own up to our own mistakes along the way."

Heinrich said the report's release will give the U.S. moral authority in its counterterrorism fight.

"At its roots, it's a battle between extremism - and some people would say evil - and the forces of democracy and good," Heinrich said. "We're better than (what is contained in) this report. We're better than torture. Torture is not who we are, and it was very destructive to our ability to lead effectively on the global stage. I think this report is the beginning of putting that behind us so that we can be the world's leading voice against terrorism." Other Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation echoed Heinrich's views. "The Senate investigators' report documents the use of brutal interrogation techniques that I believe constitute torture and violate U.S. and international law," Udall said. "In the wake of the 9/11 attacks, we compromised the values that make our nation great." "There was huge resistance by the Central Intelligence Agency and others in government from this coming out, but I think it's an important thing to get out what has happened and make sure it doesn't happen again," Udall added in a conference call with New Mexico reporters Tuesday. Lujan Grisham also condemned the actions outlined in the report. "I am repulsed by the details of the torture that the CIA used against detainees," Lujan Grisham said. "These actions go against our moral fabric as a nation that values human rights. Perhaps just as disturbing is the lengths to which the CIA is going to discredit the reports of torture, rather than committing to changing the culture that led to these egregious acts of violence." Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., said, "The CIA's efforts to mislead and conceal the full nature of their actions were deplorable. The report is an important step toward understanding and rectifying the mistakes that were made during this period in our nation's history," he said. Details

LUJAN APPLAUDS PASSAGE OF BILL TO HELP PREVENT VETERAN SUICIDES

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 420 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District applauded the unanimous passage of legislation in the House today to help prevent suicide among our nation's veterans. The Clay Hunt Suicide Prevention for American Veterans Act expands access to mental health services and increases the capacity and efficiency of VA care to address the needs of veterans returning home from war.

"With an estimated 22 veterans committing suicide every day - more than 8,000 each year, we are facing an epidemic that we cannot ignore," Congressman Lujan said. "The brave men and women who have sacrificed so much to protect and defend our nation, our values, and our way of life must receive the support they need and have earned. An estimated 600,000 men and women who have served in combat have traumatic brain injury, PTSD, or depression, and we must have the capacity to ensure access to the vital mental health services that can help them heal from the wounds of war. This legislation is an important step forward, and must be part of our continuing effort to honor the service and sacrifice of our nation's veterans."

The legislation, which is named in honor of Marine Corporal Clay Hunt, an Iraq and Afghanistan War veteran who was awarded the Purple Heart and dedicated suicide prevention advocate who tragically took his own life, includes a number of provisions to increase access to care. The bill:

" Establishes a peer support and community outreach pilot program to assist transitioning servicemembers with accessing VA mental health care services;

" Requires the VA to create a one-stop shot, interactive website to serve as a centralized information source regarding all mental health services to veterans;

" Takes steps to address the shortage of mental health care professionals by authorizing the VA to conduct a student loan repayment pilot program aimed at recruiting and retaining psychiatrists;

" Requires yearly evaluations, conducted by a third party, of all mental health care and suicide prevention practices and programs at the DOD and VA to determine what is working and what is not working and to make recommendations to improve care; and

" Authorizes a GAO report on the transition of care for PTSD and traumatic brain injury between the DOD and VA.

Veterans Service Organizations, including the Military Officers Association of American and Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America have voiced support for the legislation.

Meet the Chairman

BYLINE: Scott Bland

LENGTH: 343 words

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan 's (D-NM) quick ascent to the DCCC chairmanship after three terms in Congress comes at a low point for the Democratic caucus. They need another 30 seats to get back to the majority. But Lujan says the House can be in play and outlined, in an interview, some of the facets he brings to the job.

-- Lujan may be a relatively new name, but he's well acquainted with the business of his new role. His father was a longtime Democratic legislative leader in New Mexico, and Lujan has broken fundraising records at the PAC affiliated with the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. In an interview, Lujan also cited a work ethic that comes naturally with growing up on a farm. "We still shovel what the sheep make," Lujan said.

-- That's both an original and apt metaphor for modern politics. Lujan has signed up to spend the next two years incessantly cajoling donors, members, and candidates -- but the ultimate effect of all that work pales in comparison to environmental factors that Lujan and his committee cannot control. That's one of the reasonsLujan doesn't sound like he's preparing to make rapid changes at the DCCC. (Nor, for that matter , does Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi.) Lujan did, however, repeatedly talk about the DCCC job as being part of a team. Asked what he would change about the committee, Lujan responded, "Win more seats," before going on to say he wanted to make sure he "gets members engaged." "We're in this together," Lujan continued.

-- Besides that, the new chairman cited four areas where he wants to carry on with things the DCCC is doing well: Fundraising, digital (which is now deeply intertwined with the committee's financial health), field programs, and recruiting. The fundraising is particularly notable. Stretching the Dems' record of outraising the House GOP despite being in the minority will be one of Lujan's main tasks.

House Democratic leadership hasn't added too many new faces lately. This year, Lujan is the fresh face, and he's jumping right into the deep end with a new, tricky job.-- Scott Bland

New Mexico: Lujan Statement on Senate Intelligence Committee Report on CIA Interrogation Program

LENGTH: 139 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Luján Statement on Senate Intelligence Committee Report on CIA Interrogation Program

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján released the following statement today on the recently released report from the Senate Intelligence Committee on the CIA's detention and interrogation program.

"Torture is an affront to our American values. The CIA's efforts to mislead and conceal the full nature of their actions were deplorable. The Senate Intelligence Committee report is an important step toward understanding and rectifying the mistakes that were made during this period in our nation's history. We must ensure that this is never allowed to happen again."

Lujan: 'We Could Have Lost 20 or More Seats'

BYLINE: Jack Fitzpatrick

LENGTH: 116 words

Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Ben Ray Lujan (D) downplayed in an interview the amount of changes Democrats have to make after losing 13 House seats this cycle. "You'll see where some of those shifts are going to take place," Lujan said. "But I think we really have to take into consideration that based on some of the modeling and the national mood last cycle ... we could have lost 20 or more seats. The team we had in place ... kept that to 13. As we're moving into all of this, that's something to build off of."

While the political environment was not under the DCCC's control, Lujan said the committee succeeded in at least mitigating Democrats' losses. (Hotline reporting)

New Mexico: Lujan Statement on National Defense Authorization Act

LENGTH: 318 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Office of Bin Ray Lujan has issued the following news release:

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting in support of the Fiscal Year 2015 National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA), which includes a number of priorities for New Mexico.

"While I do not support everything in this bill, it does include important provisions that are key priorities for communities across New Mexico, including critical funding for environmental cleanup at Los Alamos National Laboratory. As we work to restore operations at WIPP, we must ensure that our national laboratories have the resources to meet their legal obligations for environmental remediation. We also have a moral obligation to the communities that have contributed to our national security to ensure that this waste is cleaned up in a safe and timely manner.

"NDAA also includes a number of lands bills - designating the Columbine-Hondo area as wilderness and transferring management of the Valles Caldera National Preserve - that will have a positive impact on New Mexico's economy while protecting our majestic lands and encouraging public access to our great outdoors. In addition, this bill includes legislation establishing a Manhattan Project National Historical Park that includes a site in Los Alamos and helps preserve this story so that future generations can understand both the positive and negative impacts of the project. In addition, it will recognize all those who played a key role in the national security of our nation and see that they will not be forgotten.

"Finally, I continue to have serious concerns with the current plan to equip and train Syrian rebels, and believe that an issue of this importance deserved a separate debate and vote."

Nancy Pelosi Interview Transcript

BYLINE: By Christina Bellantoni

LENGTH: 3872 words

CQ Roll Call's Emma Dumain interviewed Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., on Dec. 5. A lightly edited transcript follows.

Q: So it seems like you know you don't know what's going to come out of this appropriations package but it seems like between saving the tax extenders package deal that would not have been good for your party before the break and then looking ahead to next week where your party could be swooping in to save the government from shutting down, you know, you must be feeling kind of good right now in terms of the relevance of your party and the role that you play in sort of making things happen.

Pelosi: Well we have a higher standard than that. I mean ...

(Loud burst of laughter)

Pelosi: ... seen a tax package that was more job creating than the rest, but had to go to a place that we rejected what they were doing that I thought would be harmful. It would be harmful in the following ways: It made permanent tax breaks in the hundreds of billions of dollars for business, and ignored the needs of working families in our country. And, making it permanent tied our hands for what we could do in tax simplification and reform later as well as investments we wanted to make by reducing the revenue force.

So anyway, that had to end. The minute we got wind of what that could be and that it had a path, before it gained any respectability, I called our members and said, 'This is what I think is happening' - of course it's all behind closed doors - 'but I have to know that I can say to the president that this will, we will sustain a veto.'

The president was very aggressive on this, he knew the downside of what they were putting forth. So that put an end to that and I give my members credit - because some of the things sound very appealing, if you take one piece here and one piece there. They're appealing to their districts, but overall they understood that it was going backward in terms of what we need to do to reduce the deficit, create jobs, lower taxes for the great middle class in our country.

Q: You know, our understanding is that this was a deal brokered between Harry Reid and House Republicans ... going forward, you know, Harry Reid is your guy in the Senate right now and you know this for the next couple of weeks they have the majority and they were the ones you were looking to to make sure that they were gonna table certain pieces legislation. You know, next year, for the next two years, you guys are kind of on the same ... are you concerned about, did you see Harry Reid's role in brokering this deal as any sort of harbinger for how you're going to work together?

Pelosi: I don't really know enough because by the time we weighed in the deal was gone. I don't know how, about Harry - Senator Reid, Senator Reid was in it but I know that the ... many members in the Senate, of the House Demo - excuse me - of the Senate Democratic caucus didn't support the arrangement, but I don't know whose doorstep to put it at, except that it was a work in progress and before it progressed any further we wanted to put an end to it so I have great confidence in Harry Reid, I don't know what the arrangement will be over there if they still have a 60 vote rule requirement and that'll make a difference ...

Q: You know, people like to say, or you know, it's easy for people say, 'Oh the House Democrats are a minority, they're irrelevant.' What do you say to that?

Pelosi: Well, I don't think anyone is irrelevant. I just think the Republicans were irrelevant when they were in the minority. And especially not in the minority when your President in the White House is a Democrat, so there is leverage, and we have the ability to sustain vetoes, but we also have a relationships with the American people, and we can make ... the contrast as initiatives come forward.

I think we'll have an impact on the nature of this appropriations bill. I don't think, unless your side can always produce the votes, you're empowering the other side to make changes in the legislation. And so if they have 218 votes for whatever they're doing, no matter how bad it is, that's one thing. But I don't know if some of their people will vote - I don't know, we will see.But I don't ... I've never thought anyone was irrelevant here, as I say, especially if ... your party has the president in the White House.

The value that we have is that we have a united caucus, and we do because we build consensus. I don't determine what the approach is we will take. As I said to you, when we saw what was happening with the bill, I immediately called the members to see what authority I might, in fact, would have to say to the president, 'We will sustain the veto.'

Q: Well, you know and that's, you know, a credit to your caucus, you know, I think that people would say that John Boehner doesn't have as many members perhaps willing to work together as Democrats have willing to work together. But I think that many would argue that is also a credit to you and how you run your caucus and how you work with your people. So you know I guess the question is how, you know you say you know you're here as long as your people want you to be here and as long as you feel like -

Pelosi: Maybe not that long. (laughter) Maybe not that long.

Q: Yeah. But for the time, for the time being.

Pelosi: The Affordable Care Act was my mission.

Q: Yeah.

Pelosi: And we got it done, we're going to protect it.

Q: Yeah.

Pelosi: But I want to, when, whenever the day comes, I want to leave with a - it will be up to the caucus how they proceed after that.

Q: Yeah, yeah.

Pelosi: But I want to give them good options.

Q: Yeah. But what, what do you think, for the time being, inspires that kind of loyalty towards you and the, the desire to want you as the leader and to want to work with you?

Pelosi: Well I, I guess you'd have to speak with the members but I do, as I said, people hear me say, I consider myself a weaver at a loom just ... pulling together all the threads of different opinion in our caucus, whether it's ethnic, regional, generational, gender-wise, we have a lot of different views. Our caucus is the most diverse caucus that probably existed in the history of the world.

If you look at our caucus versus the Republican caucus, or even the entire Senate, you see a beautiful diversity that goes with it. You see personal experience that is different.

Q: Yeah.

Pelosi: And so our, our, my job, is to make sure that we have the strongest possible fabric woven from all those different threads, and that consensus that we build is what produces the unity because it's not from on up high. So if I have to say to people, 'This is a path that we have to go to vote with the Republicans to get something done, you don't have to vote for it, but I have to give it some support.'

Q: Sure.

Pelosi: Then they understand that. If you're saying to people, 'This is terrible but you have to vote for it,' that's a harder sell than if you're saying, 'We just need to be helpful and you can you know make their own judgment.' And they always make their own judgment.

Q: Yeah. Do you - there's you know a lot of talk about you know the, the influence you have in the caucus and the, you know, your description of building consensus and working with members and the incredible fundraising ability that you have.

Pelosi: I do.

Q: (Laughs) Could anybody else do this job at this moment in time but you?

Pelosi: I certainly hope so.

Q: Yeah?

(Laughter)

Pelosi: I certainly hope so. I, I, - tooting my own horn - my, the support I have in the country, originating in the great state of California, is substantial and enables me to amass resources because they believe in what I believe in and also want to see a Democratic majority. California, we've led the way to winning the House. We've led the way starting in 2000 by winning five seats. We were 26-26 going into the election, we were at 21-31. We had 10 points. And that now we're 39-14, Democrats to Republicans, when you know a dozen years ago we were 26-26.

So from a political standpoint, from numbers of members who have come, from a financial standpoint of idealistic progressives, donors there, California really was the golden - not only the Golden State - but the golden goose in terms of ideas, talent and financial resources. So that took us to a path to victory and I think there's an appreciation that we hadn't won in '94, '96, '98, 2000, 2002, and I took over in 2004. We didn't win that year but we built to win in 2006. So I think that, that's why I became speaker. And a lot of the people that we have brought in over time share values that we all share, so.

I feel very proud of the relationship that I have with the caucus but I also trust in them to do whatever they need to do once we go forward.

Q: So you know part of you know the thing about your job is, you are and have been in a position to elevate, help elevate, help facilitate the growth of members of your caucus - people like Xavier Becerra and Chris Van Hollen and Steve Israel and now [Ben Ray] Luján and Donna Edwards sort of have a seat at the table. Are you sort of cognizant of how, you know, in elevating these members, you're sort of helping to grow the next generation of leadership? Is that something that you're focused on?

Pelosi: Well, that's always a responsibility that we have. But there are other places I've probably appointed more women to be, where I had the discretion, to be chairs of committees or place them in a position where they would become chairs. I mean, when I became speaker, I appointed - God rest their souls, they passed away - but Stephanie Tubbs Jones to be chair of the Ethics Committee; Juanita Millender-McDonald, the chair of the House Administration Committee; Louise Slaughter to be chair of the Rules Committee. Now I have Linda Sánchez to be [ranking member] of the Ethics Committee now. How I've lined up people on some of the committees - both women and minorities - Bennie Thompson, there were people much senior to him who wanted to be in that position. That was a new committee so I had the ability to put that lineup in place. And so, it's not just about leadership, it's about committees as well. And, um, this place is competitive in some ways but there's so much opportunity. And beyond having a role, it's what your standing is on an issue. I'm trying to enable women to have standing on certain issues by showcasing them on those issues. So it's a ... sometimes people say, 'You're not out there enough,' and I say, 'No, but my whole point was to put other people out there on these issues.'

Q: So, it's a cool thing that you've got to do though, to put these people in the spotlight, help them grow and develop and sort of hone their portfolios. But you also feel like that's the responsibility of you as a leader, to help get these people ready for whenever there's another opportunity for them or the day, not when you step down but, you know, Mr. Clyburn, Mr. Hoyer, any one of the people occupying that position.

Pelosi: It's a generational change that will have to take place. But also it's just the electoral politics. Debbie Wasserman Schultz was running. She was in, thought she might be, in the primary. I took the unusual step as the Democratic Leader to go down pre-primary to her district and speak on her behalf, to just say that she's the person that we wanted here. So that, and in many other cases, to encourage women to - well, not only encourage but to help them to win. So it's, politically, it's um, from the standpoint of leadership but also committee assignments. And we've, I've always made sure that, women had a very strong role in whatever arena that they were playing in.

Q: And again, you see that as the responsibility of the leader to help?

Pelosi: Yes. And minorities too. Not just women but women and minorities and persons, women of color. That would be even more exciting.

Q: Have you seen over your years here any younger members who remind you of you when you were younger and coming up in the House and in politics?

Pelosi: Oh, I'm in awe of the women that I see, the younger women that I see. They do things that I could never do. I mean, I did my life sequentially - I had my five children, raised them, came to Congress. These women - as my own daughters do, work in professions and they have children that they're raising. I, I, I just, that's so remarkable to me. So I learned a lot from the younger women here and what they're accomplishing. Of course, I have five children; most people don't have five children now. But some do. And I see great things in the young women in Congress, and who aspire to Congress, are accomplishing. How they juggle home and family is beautiful to behold.

And remarkable.

And I'm not sure I would've been able to do that.

Q: Why do you think people were so excited with the Ben Ray Luján pick? It inspired such goodwill towards you, people were just so thrilled Pelosi: Ya, they were thrilled.

Q: And surprised, pleasantly surprised.

Pelosi: I think he was surprised.

(Laughter)

Q: So what ... Yeah, I think so too. I think we were all surprised. So what kind of, what kind of, you know, what does that say that everyone was excited about that? What kind of statement was that making?

Pelosi: Well, he is remarkable. He is a remarkable young man. We had many good people who were put up for the job, and any one of them would have done a very good job. I chose Ben Ray [Luján] because I've known him for a long time, I know his family, I've visited them in New Mexico on many occasions. I have seen how he is received by his constituents at the grassroots level. How he has been respected by the tribal people - in Indian Country in his district, how effective he is at political action. And everything that he was tasked to do here or volunteered to do here, he did excellent. He went beyond the gold standard that was expected of him.

And so he is a beautifully, a lovely person, his father a speaker of the assembly or whatever they call in New Mexico.

Q: Yep, yep

Pelosi: Assembly. They call it different things in places. In Baltimore where I grew up it's House of Delegates, in California it's Assembly, other places its different things. But anyway, so I knew that those family values that he had and how committed he was to working for families in his country, so from a standpoint of policy and values - very strong. As they all are. In terms of effective political action he just knows how to get it done. I've seen him in action. He knows how to get it done. And I could make the same statement for many of the people who were in the running. The respect he commands among the members is just remarkable. They were stunned, I think, and also so happy when he was, uh, when he was chosen. And we had a wealth of good candidates. He has a package that was very appealing to the members. And they trust him and that is the most important thing. Chris Van Hollen, Steve Israel, they were members that people had confidence in. And that's really an important part of it.

And so, I just took my own council on this, I didn't talk about it to many people, so people were kind of surprised. I would kind of gently ask about how he was viewed for one thing or another and it was all very positive. I am very happy about it because it also sends an important message to the Hispanic community about a young leader. I don't know how old he is.

Q: 42.

Pelosi: 42.

Q: I also think that, my impression from speaking to your members, is that they were excited that it wasn't, you know, a quote-un-quote obvious pick. Somebody whose name they had heard. It wasn't people who were jockeying for it. It seemed to them that when there is criticism of 'Oh there's no place to go,' 'Oh I'm impatient,' 'Oh I want to get up in the ranks,' that someone who could be low key and not outwardly ambitious would get elevated to this role. And they were happy that you had done it.

Pelosi: They were pleased, but we had a tremendous response from all over the country on him.

Q: It wasn't ... You were thinking more broadly of sort of the response from the community. Certainly you were also thinking about the response from the caucus though?

Pelosi: First and foremost, because he's an officer of the caucus who post his name in nomination. They had to vote for him. But also he has a beautiful reputation. I could make a case for any one of the people I would have announced. Everybody who put his or her name forward was excellent, and we want to find a role for everybody who was willing to take on that responsibility. It's a very challenging job.

Q: So you are interested in sort of seeing where people like Jim Himes and Jared Polis ... they're people that you're watching too?

Pelosi: Yeah. And they'll be part of how we go forward as well.

Q: What's your relationship like with Barack Obama at this point?

Pelosi: Excellent, I think. You'd have to ask him.

Q: Did you think it's warranted or understandable at all, the criticism that some of your members put upon him?

Pelosi: I haven't heard that much from my members - I think mostly the Senate, I think. Let me say this: A long time ago, when I came to Congress, I was so excited about the prospect of Bill Clinton becoming president after a couple terms, and some of the members here said to me, 'When you have your own party in the White House, they're never going to do everything you want them to do, so don't get your hopes up high that it's going to be like you're now in the White House. No, they're in the White House.'

So there's always, should we say, a high standard that we place there, and he's been an excellent president. But he is the president, and none of us is. [LAUGHS] He was elected by the people in a very strong way. He was re-elected by the people. For members of the president's own party to have some comment is a very natural thing. It's been happening in the whole history of our country.

Q: Speaking of Clinton, what do you think of Hillary Clinton? Have you spoken to her recently about her 2016 aspirations?

Pelosi: Never about that, but I'm going to see her tonight.

Q: Oh you are?

Pelosi: I'm going to an event that she's going to speak at.

Q: Oh, OK.

Pelosi: But I don't think we'll be talking about that because she has said - January, right, is when she? Sometime in January is when - she never said she would announce in January. She just said, I think, something to the effect of, 'If a person were considering...'

(Laughter)

Pelosi: Right, 'not, theoretically before January.'

Q: Last time you didn't put yourself into the fray.

Pelosi: No.

I did Jerry Brown in '76 and I was very young and that's sort of what catapulted me to where I am now. Then the next time, all the sudden it was Dukakis and I mean, I haven't endorsed anybody until I did endorse Richard Gephart in 2004. He is such a spectacular leader. And long, leader repeated over and over again at being the leader. And, as a matter of fact, we made a joke the other day and said even though he kept losing as Leader nobody asked him when he was leaving. And they asked me when I took us to victory and then we didn't win. [INAUDIBLE] So maybe when you don't win and you just stay and lose you will run for president.

But in any event, I thought he would make a fabulous president. And I guess that now even more so as one who has been through the idea of knowing all the issues and knowing the legislation from the standpoint of the leadership position. I thought he would make a great president.

But I haven't, then the next time I was chair of the convention in '08 and then of course through '12 we had a President. So, um, no, I think would be very exciting if Hillary Clinton runs. For people in my district and in my state, I don't know what they are gonna do if she doesn't run.

(Laughter)

They are so counting on a woman president. It would be a very exciting thing.

Q: So you can see yourself getting into the fray in this case ...

Pelosi: Well, I don't know about the fray, I've got fray of my own.

(Laughter)

Pelosi: I've got my own fray.

Q: But in terms in coming out, you can see yourself maybe endorsing ...

Pelosi: Let me say this about Hillary Clinton: When she runs, she will win. And when she wins she'll go to the White House as one of the most prepared people in modern history to go there. She has the experience from the standpoint of her own experience in this administration as Secretary of State, as a United States Senator, front row seats as a First Lady - an active First Lady, First Lady of Arkansas establishing organizations to help children, which has been her passion. So I think from a state level, federal level, legislative level and administrative level she understands the territory and the American people.

Q: Can I ask one more question?

Off mic: A quick one.

Q: Going back to what we talked about in the beginning, the tax-package or looking forward next week to the 'cromnibus' or whatever we're going to see, it's never fun to see the government, you know, on the brink of collapse or whatever, but is it gratifying for you in every case where the Democrats can come together and rise to an occasion where Republicans cannot? Is it gratifying?

Pelosi: No, I would be more gratified if we could come to bipartisan agreement, find our common ground, which people send us here to do. When you can't find it you stand your ground. But we are responsible. We are responsible people, we are a responsible party. We would never consider shutting down government. And that to me was something so remarkable that the Republicans allowed the government to be shut down for 17 days. When their proposal was one that we accepted, but they didn't. They didn't accept their own proposal.

Q: Yeah.

Pelosi: And because they wanted to shut down government, cheered when they did, and only, what, 60 some members voted to open up government when the vote came down. ... Only 87 of them voted to open [up government.]

144 of them voted against opening up government. 144 of them, Republicans, that's remarkable. And it was their proposal. Their 800, 900 - that was their proposal. We didn't even like the proposal. But we liked shutting down government less.

Q: But you might - you must like gloat a little - like sit back at the end of the day with a glass of wine and say, 'Ah.'

Pelosi: Well I don't drink alcohol.

(Laughter)

Q: When you sit back with your chocolate and go, 'Mmm, it's good to be Nancy Pelosi.'

(Laughter)

Pelosi: No, I would rather they did the responsible thing so we wouldn't have to bail them out every time. And I'm still optimistic that in the negotiations over this omnibus that we can reach a place - Again, not the bill we would write, but we don't have the majority - but a place that we can support and we can remove all doubt in the public's mind that this is, that we don't take this responsibility seriously.

We have leverage if they don't have the votes. They have leverage because they know we will be responsible.

Q: Oh, I see.

Pelosi: And that allows them to be irresponsible to a certain extent.

Democrats Irrelevant? Don't Be So Sure, Pelosi Promises

BYLINE: By Emma Dumain

LENGTH: 1133 words

Nancy Pelosi insists she doesn't gloat when House Republicans can't shore up the votes among their own members to pass any number of critical bills, and it's Democrats who get to swoop in and call themselves the heroes.

"I would rather they did the responsible thing so we wouldn't have to bail them out every time," the California Democrat quipped of her GOP counterparts.

But the minority leader, who sat for an interview in her Capitol Hill office with CQ Roll Call, must be feeling gratified.

The government is on the precipice of a shutdown, and if Republicans can't get to 218 votes on their side of the aisle, Pelosi will get to call in the cavalry once again.

It would be the second time in a matter of weeks that she's gotten to flex her muscle: She successfully squelched a pre-Thanksgiving deal on a tax extenders package negotiated exclusively by Senate Democrats and House Republicans - a deal that would have been a nonstarter for her caucus and President Barack Obama.

"The minute we got wind of what [it] would be and that it had a path, before it gained any respectability, I called our members and said, 'This is what I think is happening ... but I have to know that I can say to the president that this will sustain a veto,'" Pelosi recalled.

With Obama still in the White House, Pelosi remains a player, as her impact on the tax extenders package showed. But how much leverage she retains in the 114th could come down to how she fits into the Republican-controlled Congress over the next two years.

"I don't think anyone is irrelevant. We have leverage if they don't have the votes," she said. "They have leverage because they know we will be responsible. And that allows them to be irresponsible to a certain extent."

And 2016? Well, that's a whole new ballgame. By then, the country could see its first female president, said the nation's first female speaker.

"Let me say this about Hillary [Rodham] Clinton: When she runs, she will win. And when she wins, she'll go to the White House as one of the most prepared people in modern history to go there," Pelosi said, stopping just short of an endorsement that would be significant for Clinton, the former first lady and ex-secretary of State.

A favorite parlor game of political observers and operatives, members and aides is wondering when Pelosi might retire.

For the past 12 years, she's been her caucus's most senior leader, and during that time she's cemented her legacy as a master vote-counter, consensus-builder and fundraiser.

She's said she's continuing to serve because she does so at the pleasure of her members, and because she wants to protect the landmark, and perpetually embattled, health care legislation she helped draft and pass in 21010.

Could 2016 be the year she steps aside, especially if Clinton runs and wins?

Pelosi, 74, offers no hints, but she doesn't pretend she'll be around forever.

Reminded that she said she'd stay on as leader as long as the caucus wants her, Pelosi joked, "Well, maybe not that long."

Asked whether anybody else could now do what she does, she drew in a breath and laughed: "I certainly hope so."

"Tooting my own horn, ... the support I have in the country, originating in the great state of California, is substantial, and enables me to amass resources because they believe in what I believe in and also want to see a Democratic majority," said Pelosi, who has raised more than $400 million since she entered leadership in 2002.

Despite some grumblings that she has an inner circle and doesn't like to expand it, Pelosi insisted she is and has always been laying the groundwork for a next generation of leadership to ascend when the time comes for her - and Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer and Assistant Leader James E. Clyburn, also in their mid-70s - to step aside.

"That's always a responsibility that we have," Pelosi said. "I've probably appointed more women to be, where I had the discretion, to be chairs of committees, or place them in positions where they would become chairs."

The same is true, she said, for members of color, such as Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, whom she tapped to be top Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee. "There were people more senior who wanted that position, but it was a new committee so I had the ability to put that lineup in place," she said.

"It's not just about leadership," she added. "This place is competitive in some ways, but there's so much opportunity, and beyond having a role, it's what your standing is on the issue."

Pelosi tried recently to help elevate a woman to serve as ranking member of Energy and Commerce - a fellow Californian and her close friend, Rep. Anna G. Eshoo. Her endorsement ended up not being enough for Eshoo to defeat the more senior Frank Pallone Jr. of New Jersey, and it was one of a series of personal obstacles Pelosi faced in the immediate aftermath of an Election Day drubbing, when members were looking for someone to blame and targeted the minority leader for not taking ownership of the losses.

She regained some goodwill, however, when she surprised nearly everybody and selected New Mexico Democrat Ben Ray Luján to be the next chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

With members expecting Pelosi to promote someone already firmly installed in her circle, the gesture was met with enthusiasm. Even her critics saw it as a sign their leader was open to singling out lawmakers who were outside the box, had put their heads down and worked hard and who didn't necessarily have household names.

"He has a beautiful reputation," Pelosi said of Luján.

Pelosi said members would have to answer the question of what has earned her the loyalty she enjoys, but she described herself as "a weaver of a loom just ... pulling together all the threads of different opinion in our caucus.

"My job is to make sure that we have the strongest possible fabric woven from all those different threads," she continued. "If I have to say to people, 'This is a path that we have to go, to vote with the Republicans to get something done, you don't have to vote for it, but I have to give it some support,' then they understand that. If you're saying to people, 'This is terrible, but you have to vote for it,' that's a harder sell than if you're saying, 'We just need to be helpful and you can ... make your own judgment.'

"And they always do make their own judgment," she said.

After 9 years, Senate set to approve 'Copper Keystone' mine

Time for a Democratic Reboot? The Party's House Campaign Chair Doesn't Think So

BYLINE: Scott Bland

LENGTH: 1204 words

After another disappointing election for House Democrats, one that gave Republicans their largest majority in almost a century, the new chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has a seemingly incongruous message: Keep calm and carry on.

DCCC Chairman Ben Ray Lujan is adamant, despite a 13-seat loss in November, that the committee has more to build on than to fix. After all, you don't have to make mistakes to lose an election, especially in the kind of horrible environment Democrats faced this year.

Yet even some fellow Democrats who acknowledge that truth are chafing at the notion after being relegated to a 188-seat minority in the House of Representatives.

"You'll see where some of those shifts are going to take place," Lujan said in an interview in his new DCCC office. "But I think we really have to take into consideration that based on some of the modeling and the national mood last cycle ... we could have lost 20 or more seats."

"The team we had in place ... kept that to 13," Lujan said. "As we're moving into all of this, that's something to build off of."

The committee has numerous building blocksits field program, digital program, aggressive recruiting, and especially its strong fundraisingfor 2016 that helped mitigate November's losses and will position the party to take advantage when there is a better political environment in the future, Lujan said. Unlike the political environment or overall party messaging, those factors are under the DCCC's complete control.

But some Democrats on and off Capitol Hill have grown concerned since the election about whether the DCCC is reacting with enough urgency to another disappointing election result. Lujan's first move as chairman was to retain Executive Director Kelly Ward, who echoed the new chairman's could've-been-worse attitude in a statement when she was rehired. The Democratic National Committee has convened a "Victory Task Force" to pinpoint areas where the party "can strengthen and improve operations," but Lujan didn't offer specifics on areas where the DCCC could improve.

Asked to name one thing he would change at the committee after having some time to review things, Lujan said, "We want to win more seats." And, he said, he wants to keep fellow members engaged with the committee.

That's hardly a reboot.

"After three cycles of underperforming expectations, that would seem to highlight the need for new thinking," said one Democratic consultant who asked for anonymity to speak freely. (The consultant compared the DCCC's line to Kevin Bacon's character in Animal House, who shouts, "Remain calm! All is well!" during the movie's climactic stampede.) "I would think that at some point they're going to have a problem convincing donors to give money without results."

That complaint is not universal, though. "I'm frankly amazed at the money they raised and that they didn't lose more seats," said Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic lobbyist and donor. "People are always frustrated when you don't win, but what do you want to do? ... I have not heard any undercurrent or overcurrent of it being the DCCC's fault or anything."

The DCCC outraised its Republican counterpart in both of outgoing Chairman Steve Israel's cycles at the helm, a virtually unprecedented accomplishment for the party out of power and one that likely saved seats.

Much of that funding came through the committee's digital department, which doubled in size under Israel and drove the DCCC's fundraising, including over 4 million individual donations. Also on the digital front, the committee spent over $3 million messaging persuadable voters online in 2014 along with over $67 million on TV ads.

On the campaign side, Lujan is reprising Israel's early recruiting efforts from years past. One of Democrats' losing 2014 candidates, Emily Cain of Maine, came to the DCCC Wednesday morning for meetings with Lujan and other party leaders about running for the Democratic-leaning district again in 2016. Lujan cited districts Democrats lost in Nevada and Iowa, plus a GOP-held open seat in the Philadelphia suburbs, as top targets on which he's already focused.

President Obama carried 26 GOP-held districts when he won reelection in 2012, including the Maine seat that Lujan wants Cain to run for again.

And Lujan also cited a committee field programguided this year by an internal targeting departmentthat attempted about 42 million voter contacts in 2014 and registered 80,000 new voters. In some districts, like Rep.-elect Gwen Graham's, the number of new DCCC-registered voters was bigger than the Democratic candidates' winning margins.

"People don't dismiss field, but it's not something everybody knows how to do well," said MaryAnne Pintar, who managed Democratic Rep. Scott Peters's reelection campaign in San Diego. Peters won by about 6,000 votes. "If you're a campaign manager, you are paying attention to budget and mail and TV and earned media messaging and more, and having their assistance and early support on the field end was tremendous."

In a postelection conference call for House Democrats and a subsequent caucus meeting, both reelected and defeated members lined up to voice their support for the DCCC. One of them was Peters, who touted the field program (as did Reps. Ron Barber, Ami Bera, Julia Brownley, Elizabeth Esty, and Rick Nolan), according to a source in the room at the Nov. 13 caucus meeting. Outgoing Rep. Carol Shea-Porter said Israel and the committee he led didn't deserve "any of the criticism he's getting," according to the source. "I lost my district by 4 points and Jeanne Shaheen lost it too," Shea-Porter reportedly said. "It wasn't about a move here or a move there."

But the post-election call "struck a number of members as problematic," said one House Democratic aide. "I think that for a lot of them there was a feeling there wasn't going to be any opportunity to have an honest discussion of what happened in the cycle. The idea that the day after a tough election was just going to be a litany of thank yous, it just didn't connect."

Still, House Democrats didn't suffer the kind of shocking losseslike losing the Maryland gubernatorial racethat plagued other arms of their party. A Democratic source noted that nearly half of the DCCC's independent expenditures went into races that the party won, including a number of very tight contests, despite national polling showing a worse political environment than 2010, by some measures. Lujan pledged that the DCCC is "going to be on offense" in two years and said "the House is definitely going to be in play in 2016."

Democrats would need to gain 30 seats to retake the House, a tall order that has some in the party wondering if they might need a new round of redistricting or a GOP president as a foil in order to take the majority once more. Lujan said he's optimistic that higher turnout in 2016 will solve some of the party's problems.

"We need more people voting," Lujan said. "We saw turnout across the country at the lowest it's been in a long, long time, so the more we can get people excited about getting to the polls, which happens in presidential election years, is something I'm looking forward to and why I think we'll be on offense instead of defense."

Delegation Praises Retiring BLM Director for N.M., Urges 'Careful Consideration' of State's Diverse Public Lands Issues in Selecting Successor

LENGTH: 729 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Tom Udall, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Luján, Michelle Lujan Grisham and Steve Pearce announced that they have sent a letter to the Bureau of Land Management (BLM), thanking retiring BLM New Mexico State Director Jesse Juen for his thoughtful and balanced leadership, and urging the BLM to proceed carefully to hire Juen's successor.

BLM State Director is a critical position in New Mexico, responsible for 850 employees and the management of more than 13.4 million acres of public lands and 26 million acres of federal oil, natural gas, and minerals.

"We have been fortunate to have a dedicated leader like Jesse, who has shown a focus and attention to the balanced management of BLM lands within New Mexico, and to the unique issues that our state's public lands face," the lawmakers wrote. "New Mexico's unique landscape, history, and culture is reflected in the state's public lands. We would encourage you to select an individual to fill the New Mexico State Director position who is familiar with the state and the unique issues that BLM land managers and BLM land users face."

Those unique issues include the importance of balancing public lands management to support oil, gas and mineral leasing, grazing, recreation and conservation; as well as the needs of diverse communities, including Native Americans, and Spanish Land Grant Communities. Public lands also are critical to New Mexico's economy. In fiscal year 2012, they supported more than 85,000 jobs and boosted the economy by more than $7.8 billion.

"We again applaud Jesse for his tireless work in balancing the complex issues that face New Mexico's public lands," the letter concludes. "He will be a tough act for anyone to follow, but we respectfully request your careful consideration in selecting a new State Director who will be equally capable of managing New Mexico's public lands."

A copy of the letter is available HERE and below:

The Honorable Neil Kornze
Director
U.S. Bureau of Land Management

1849 C Street, NW
Washington, DC 20240-0001

Dear Director Kornze:

Since February of 2012, Jesse Juen has led the Bureau of Land Management (BLM) in our state as the BLM New Mexico State Director. We have been fortunate to have a dedicated leader like Jesse, who has shown a focus and attention to the balanced management of BLM lands within New Mexico, and to the unique issues that our state's public lands face. We express our sincere appreciation for his public service and the work of his capable staff, and we wish him the best in his upcoming retirement.

As we look forward to the coming year, we would request your careful consideration of the BLM New Mexico State Director position. As you know, New Mexico's unique landscape, history, and culture is reflected in the state's public lands. We would encourage you to select an individual to fill the New Mexico State Director position who is familiar with the state and the unique issues that BLM land managers and BLM land users face.

The New Mexico State Director is responsible for the management of more than 13.4 million acres of public lands and 26 million acres of federal oil, natural gas, and minerals. The director also manages and sets the priorities for a team of more than 850 employees. According to your agency's own statistics, in fiscal year 2012, the BLM's management of the public lands in New Mexico has supported more than 85,000 jobs and boosted the economy by more than $7.8 billion. Last year, New Mexico's share of oil and gas revenue on public lands was over $470 million. The BLM State Director position is extremely important position for New Mexico, a position that demands a strong leader who is knowledgeable of oil and gas leasing, endangered species, recreation, ranching, and the traditional use issues that the many Native American and Spanish Land Grant communities face.

We again applaud Jesse for his tireless work in balancing the complex issues that face New Mexico's public lands. He will be a tough act for anyone to follow, but we respectfully request your careful consideration in selecting a new State Director who will be equally capable of managing New Mexico's public lands.

Defense nominee wins NM delegation praise

BYLINE: Michael Coleman, JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: INSIDE THE BELTWAY

LENGTH: 667 words

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. -- New Mexico's congressional delegation, representing a state with a heavy military presence, is generally supportive of President Obama's decision to tap Ashton Carter as the next defense secretary.

Obama made the announcement official today at a White House ceremony. Carter, a former deputy secretary of defense, will succeed Chuck Hagel, whose tenure was marred by a shaky confirmation hearing and sometimes sour relations with Capitol Hill.

Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., said Carter will face a slew of complex issues and did not say how he planned to vote on the nomination. Udall also praised the work of Hagel, who was viewed favorably by some on the left for his reticence to engage the U.S. in more overseas conflicts.

"The United States and the broader international community are confronting multiple quickly evolving threats in the Middle East, including the emergence of the brutal terrorist organization ISIS," Udall said. "Ashton Carter has the respect of senior military leaders having served under multiple secretaries of defense, managed large budgets and handled many demands under scrutiny. I have appreciated Secretary Hagel's strong understanding of the strategic importance of our national laboratories to our national defense, and I look forward to meeting with Mr. Carter during the confirmation process to discuss his views on New Mexico's national security mission."

Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., said he was impressed by Carter's resume but also didn't take a definitive position prior to the looming Senate confirmation process.

"Having served under 11 Secretaries of Defense, Dr. Carter is no stranger to the institution and the issues our Department of Defense must address--at home and abroad," Heinrich said. "There are a number of evolving national security challenges that the United States and our allies must confront around the world, particularly the Middle East, Europe and the Asia Pacific, and we need strong leadership to do so. As a physicist, Dr. Carter also understands the importance of nuclear deterrence and nonproliferation, both of which are critical to global security and the state of New Mexico.

"I look forward to Dr. Carter's confirmation process in the U.S. Senate to better understand his thoughts on how he will address these challenges and how New Mexico's military installations and national labs will contribute to our collective national security mission."

U.S. House members don't have a vote on Carter's nomination - only senators do - but I asked them to weigh in anyway. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., suggested she supported the nominee.

"I am encouraged by the bipartisan support for Ashton Carter, based on his effective leadership experience at the Pentagon," she said. "That kind of experience is necessary for anyone nominated to serve as Defense Secretary, but particularly during difficult times when American soldiers are risking their lives to defend our nation. I look forward to working with Mr. Carter to ensure he continues to make the many defense assets in New Mexico a top priority for our national security."

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., also praised Carter's appointment.

"Ash Carter is a veteran of the Department of Defense, serving in many different capacities for a number of Presidents. He knows the Department of Defense, how it runs and where it can become more efficient. I believe he has the knowledge and expertise required to be a capable Secretary of Defense. However, he must prove this. If nominated and confirmed, he must hit the ground running in targeting and destroying ISIS and long-term strategy for our national security."

Meanwhile, Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., withheld judgment.

"While as a member of the House I will not have a vote on Senate confirmation, I will watch the process closely and look forward to hearing where Mr. Carter stands on a number of important issues to New Mexico and our nation," he said.

Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., could not be reached for comment.

House OKs defense bill with New Mexico provisions

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL

LENGTH: 335 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

SANTA FE, N.M. (AP) - Management of the Valles Caldera National Preserve would be transferred to the National Park Service and thousands of acres in northern New Mexico would be set aside as wilderness under a defense policy bill approved by the U.S. House on Thursday.

The must-pass legislation is expected to be considered by the Senate before the end of the year.

The measure would create an historical park preserving sites at Los Alamos and elsewhere where the atomic bomb was built, and it would designate 45,000-acre Columbine Hondo Wilderness Area north of Taos.

The House's vote of 300-199 sends the measure to the Senate where some Republican senators don't like the addition of various provisions to expand wilderness areas.

But the state's two U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, both Democrats, praised the measure and said the provisions have overwhelming support. "This is an exciting step - we're extremely close to the finish line and being able to protect these beautiful New Mexico landscapes for generations to come," Udall said.

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-Santa Fe, said although he had serious concerns with the current plan to equip and train Syrian rebels, he was happy the New Mexico provisions were added.

"While I do not support everything in this bill, it does include important provisions that are key priorities for communities across New Mexico, including critical funding for environmental cleanup at Los Alamos National Laboratory," Lujan said in a statement.

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., however, was among 32 Republicans and 87 Democrats who voted against passage of the defense bill.

Pearce, an advocate for veterans and for less federal land, said in a statement that "creating nearly 250,000 new acres of wilderness that will greatly restrict multiple use on the lands, is simply unacceptable. Already extremely disadvantaged by massive amounts of public lands, the West continues to be under attack by environmental and special interest groups that degrade the Western way of life."

House passes bill condemning orders on immigration

LENGTH: 567 words

Emboldened House Republicans issued a stern but symbolic rebuke to President Barack Obama over immigration Thursday, passing a bill declaring his executive actions to curb deportations "null and void and without legal effect."
Outraged Democrats, immigrant advocates and the White House said the GOP was voting to tear families apart and eject parents.

"Rather than deport students and separate families and make it harder for law enforcement to do its job, I just want the Congress to work with us to pass a common-sense law to fix that broken immigration system," Obama said before the vote.
Even supporters acknowledged that the bill by Rep. Ted Yoho, R-Fla., which says Obama was acting "without any constitutional or statutory basis," was mostly meant to send a message. It stands no chance in the Senate, which remains under Democratic control until January.
The real fight may lie ahead as conservatives push to use must-pass spending legislation to block Obama.
For now, Republicans insisted they must go on record denouncing what they described on the House floor as an outrageous power grab by Obama.
"The president's decision to defy the Constitution by using executive actions to change immigration law cannot go unopposed," said Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., who voted for the bill. "The legislation passed today is a proactive response to this gross abuse of power It clarifies that the president's use of executive authority does not extend to exempting millions from legal action at once. This is a needed step in any legal challenge to the president's abuse of power."

New Mexico's other two representatives, Democrats Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham, voted against the bill.
"The president thinks he can just sit in the Oval Office and make up his own laws. That's not the way our system of government works," said Rep. Steve Scalise, R-La. "This legislation says you can't do that, Mr. President. There is a rule of law."
The vote was 219-197, with three Democratic "yes" votes and seven Republican "no" votes. Three Republicans voted "present."
Obama's executive actions last month will extend deportation relief and work permits to an estimated 4 million immigrants who are in the U.S. illegally, mostly those who have been in the country more than five years and have children who are U.S. citizens or legal permanent residents. He also reordered law enforcement priorities and expanded an existing deportation deferral program for immigrants brought illegally as kids. Compounding the GOP's anger, Obama's executive action came barely two weeks after Republicans trounced Democrats in the midterm elections, winning control of the Senate and increasing their majorities in the House.
Even as emotions ran high in debate on the bill, many involved acknowledged it was mostly a sideshow as Republicans struggled to find some way to undo what Obama has done - not just register their disapproval. Party leaders acknowledged their options were limited.
The Yoho bill was part of a two-part strategy by House GOP leadership to appease conservative immigration hard-liners without risking a government shutdown. Their hope was that after approving it, Republicans would move on next week to vote on legislation to keep most of the government running for a year, with a shorter time frame for the Homeland Security Department, which oversees immigration. 2014 Legal Monitor Worldwide.

NM bills moving ahead in Congress; Lame-duck session taking up legislation

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C1

LENGTH: 497 words

WASHINGTON - Congress' lame-duck session is proving productive for members of the New Mexico congressional delegation who suddenly see movement on long-stalled legislation they wrote or co-sponsored.

On Tuesday, the House approved a bill sponsored by Republican Rep. Steve Pearce that would reauthorize the Native American Housing Assistance and Self-Determination Act of 1996. The congressman has worked on the bill for almost two years.

Later Tuesday, a deal emerged that incorporated several public lands bills sponsored by Democratic Sens. Martin Heinrich and Tom Udall into a defense spending bill. That legislation, expected to win approval by both chambers of Congress, now includes:

A bill designating the Columbine-Hondo area in Taos County as wilderness. The bill would expand the Wheeler Peak Wilderness by 650 acres and shift a boundary to create a loop trail along the Lost Lake Trail from Taos Ski Valley to the East Fork Trail to Red River.

A bill to move the Valles Caldera National Preserve in northern New Mexico into a new management structure designed to increase public access. The legislation would transfer management of the preserve from the current board of trustees to the National Park Service.

A bill to establish the Manhattan Project National Historical Park in Los Alamos. The park would conserve sites and artifacts that played a key role in the dawn of the nuclear era. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., co-sponsored the legislation.

A measure to extend a pilot program that has helped the Bureau of Land Management streamline the oil and gas drilling permit process while strengthening a review system that helps meet environmental and safety standards.

"Thanks to years of effort and support from the local communities, our state will have new destinations for families and visitors to enjoy," Heinrich said.

Pearce's Native American housing bill would reauthorize a program that disburses federal block grants to tribes and Alaska Native villages, which use the money to sustain affordable housing for low-income tribal households. The Pearce bill would create a loan guarantee program to help tribes obtain private financing for housing and authorize money,which would still need to be appropriated, for training and technical assistance.

Pearce said he is optimistic the Senate will pass the bill before the end of the current session of Congress.

"We got a lot of bipartisan support," Pearce said. "I think we'll see this thing passed and signed into law."

Earlier this month, Congress also cleared a bill sponsored by Udall and Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, also a New Mexico Democrat, that would allow the Amy Biehl charter school in Albuquerque to purchase the old post office it currently leases for classroom space. President Barack Obama signed the legislation into law last week. Lujan Grisham said the move would "provide a permanent home to a high school located in the heart of Downtown Albuquerque that provides quality education to at-risk students."

LUJAN STATEMENT ON NATIONAL DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION ACT;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 309 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting in support of the Fiscal Year 2015 National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA), which includes a number of priorities for New Mexico.

"While I do not support everything in this bill, it does include important provisions that are key priorities for communities across New Mexico, including critical funding for environmental cleanup at Los Alamos National Laboratory. As we work to restore operations at WIPP, we must ensure that our national laboratories have the resources to meet their legal obligations for environmental remediation. We also have a moral obligation to the communities that have contributed to our national security to ensure that this waste is cleaned up in a safe and timely manner.

"NDAA also includes a number of lands bills - designating the Columbine-Hondo area as wilderness and transferring management of the Valles Caldera National Preserve - that will have a positive impact on New Mexico's economy while protecting our majestic lands and encouraging public access to our great outdoors. In addition, this bill includes legislation establishing a Manhattan Project National Historical Park that includes a site in Los Alamos and helps preserve this story so that future generations can understand both the positive and negative impacts of the project. In addition, it will recognize all those who played a key role in the national security of our nation and see that they will not be forgotten.

"Finally, I continue to have serious concerns with the current plan to equip and train Syrian rebels, and believe that an issue of this importance deserved a separate debate and vote."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi caught a good many political know-it-alls back on Capitol Hill by surprise last week, when she announced that New Mexico's 3rd District Democratic Congressman Ben Ray Lujan will be the next chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

It will be quite a jump in the congressional pecking order for Lujan, who was first elected to the 3rd District seat in 2008 as the successor to Democrat Tom Udall who ran (successfully) that year for a berth in the United States Senate.

Both men were handily reelected this year, with Udall returning to a Senate under GOP control and Lujan returning to a House even more firmly dominated by an unruly cadre of Republicans hitherto prone to government shutdowns.

So, over and above his obligations to District 3 constituents, when the new Congress convenes in January, Congressman Lujan will be spending a good deal of his time gearing up for the elections of 2016, when Democrats hope to elect sufficient of their own to tame those unruly GOPers.

To put it mildly, Ben Ray Lujan has accepted a big challenge here. Clearly his political profile, both here at home and nationally, will be substantially elevated with this assignment.

Yet the stubborn fact is that U. S. House districts around the country have been so effectively jerry-rigged (if not gerrymandered) by Republican state legislatures as to make it all but impossible to elect Democrats to many of those seats.

Not since a gentleman named Herbert Hoover was president have there been as many Republicans in the U.S. House of Representatives as there will be in just a few weeks.

It is a reality that bedeviled the outgoing DCCC chairman, New York Congressman Steve Israel, who spent four years in that job only to preside over a net loss of more than 65 erstwhile Democratic seats to Republicans during his tenure.

Ben Ray Lujan's personal political resume doesn't run deep. Aside from his six years in Congress, where he is vice-chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, it includes a stint on the New Mexico Public Regulation Commission.

But politics is in his blood, as it were. His father, the late Ben Lujan, Sr., was a powerhouse in the Legislature for years and served as House Speaker for a number of years before illness forced him into retirement.

Nor does it end there. His Democratic colleague in New Mexico's three-member congressional delegation, District 1 Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, is his cousin. (Grisham is reportedly slated to become vice-chair of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus.

It has been almost a quarter of a century since California's Congressman Tony Coelho became the first Hispanic to chair the DCCC.

Lujan will be only the second and there are some back in Washington who believe that beyond "political astuteness," one of the things Nancy Pelosi sought in choosing a new chair for the Democratic Campaign Committee was someone who might prove helpful in energizing that big bloc of Hispanics with a tendency to vote Democratic.

The website Politico.com recently noted that one San Francisco Democratic "mega-donor," Steve Phillips, applauds Lujan's appointment and thinks it will help Democrats with young Latino voters through the Southwest.

"That's the future of the party," Phillips is quoted as saying.

All of which augers well for the congressman and his state.

Far too often of late, New Mexico has flirted with the bottom of the barrel but it has traditionally benefited when its members of Congress accrue influence.

Language preservation act helps tribal communities

BYLINE: Richard Reyes Staff writer city@gallupindependent.com

LENGTH: 300 words

DATELINE: GALLUP

GALLUP -- U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N. M., introduced legislation to help Native American communities preserve their traditional languages, according to a news release.

The legislation is an updated reauthorization of the Esther Martinez Native American Language Preservation Act. It improves an existing program to support tribal communities and makes resources available.

"Language preservation is a vital component of broader efforts to preserve the nuances of Native American culture and traditions that are often lost in translation," Luján stated in the news release. "Language is an essential part of history, culture and way of life. The preservation of culture depends upon the endurance of native languages that have been an integral part of tribes in New Mexico and across the country."

He states that continuing the programs implemented by the Esther Martinez Native American Language Preservation Act will help expand fluency in native languages, helping tribal communities preserve their cultural traditions and ensuring that these languages will continue to provide meaning and value to future generations.

In 2006, the Esther Martinez Native American Language Preservation Act was signed into law to support language immersion programs, language survival schools and language restoration programs.

In addition to reauthorizing the act, Luján's bill increases the sustainability and flexibility of the program by extending the duration of grant awards up to five years, giving projects a more stable funding source and increasing the impact of each project.

Additionally, more language schools and language nests in low populated and remote areas will be eligible to access grant funding. The reauthorization of the law would allow existing programs to continue through fiscal year 2019.

REP. LINDA SANCHEZ ELECTED TO LEAD CONGRESSIONAL HISPANIC CAUCUS

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 219 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of California Rep. Linda Sanchez:

Six-term Congresswoman Linda Sanchez was elected to be the new chair of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus on Tuesday.

Sanchez, D-Calif., will take over in the next congressional session that begins in January, while current chairman Rep. Ruben Hinojosa, D-Texas, will finish out his term for the current 113th Congress when it adjourns for the year. Five U.S. House newcomers, three who are Democrats and two Republicans, will raise the total Latino members in Congress next year to 29.

The caucus is open to members of all parties, but is all Democrats. Republicans split from the caucus years ago and formed the Congressional Hispanic Conference.

Generally the caucus chairmanship goes to the member who has been serving as first vice chair, which was Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. But caucus members elected Sanchez to the spot after Lujan was chosen by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., to head the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Lujan is the first Latino chosen to head the DCCC.

The caucus will be led by two Latinas next session. Caucus members also elected Rep. Michelle Grisham Lujan, D-N.M., to serve as first vice chair. A Democratic aide said Sanchez and Grisham were elected by unanimous consent.

High-flying Luján to stay grounded

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. B2

LENGTH: 722 words

The day after House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi surprised everyone on Capitol Hill by naming Rep. Ben Ray Luján as the next chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the obviously - and understandably - elated northern New Mexico congressman made the rounds at the U.S. Capitol.

As his phone blew up with congratulations from excited friends, family members and constituents, Luján appeared at a press conference with Pelosi and the rest of the House Democratic leadership team, then he headed to the House floor to vote. A member of the DCCC's press office shadowed him.

After the vote, I caught up with the suddenly in-demand congressman in the House Speaker's Lobby, an ornate room that glitters with bronze sculpture, rich oil paintings, Tennessee marble and antique floor tiles. Luján, a 42-year-old former blackjack dealer, suddenly seemed a long way from his family's homestead in the hills north of Santa Fe.

After congratulating him, I asked Luján how he planned to fulfill his duties as the House Democrats' top election strategist while keeping an eye on the people and issues back home in his remote congressional district. How would he avoid "going Washington?"

"If anyone is concerned about that, they can join me this weekend (at his home in New Mexico) and help me clean out the sheep barns," the congressman said with a broad smile. "If they have a free hand and want to help me shovel some of what the sheep produced, come on by!"

Obviously, Luján was playfully saying that he won't forget where he came from. A lot of ambitious politicians who come to Washington say that - right before they turn into insufferable, pompous blowhards. To his credit, that sort of puffery isn't Luján's style. He knows it wouldn't play well in Rio Arriba County, Taos or Farmington.

Say what you will about the fourth-term congressman, but he is very much a product of his humble home state, from the big bolo ties he wears on the House floor to his lilting New Mexico accent, to the cadre of New Mexicans in Washington who staff his Capitol Hill office and occasionally hang out in D.C. bars watching Lobos games with him.

Luján will no doubt return home to northern New Mexico regularly to check on his elderly mother, shovel the sheep barns and tend to his constituents.

But he'll also be in heavy national demand as DCCC chairman.

Two nights after Pelosi tapped him to head the House Democrats' election strategy, MSNBC asked him to talk about the president's immigration plan on Rachel Maddow's show. Luján did fine on Maddow, although his tendency to rely heavily on predictable Democratic Party talking points was on display.

Pelosi gave Luján the job because he is relatively young and energetic. The fact that he is Hispanic clearly factored into the decision, as well.

After the shellacking Democrats took in the mid-term elections this month, Luján has a lot - and I mean a lot - of work to do.

If Democrats do better in 2016, his performance as DCCC chair could vault him to an even bigger position on the national stage. If they underperform, it will tarnish his rising political star.

Lujan is one of the more liberal members of the House and he's not bashful about his positions. More than one Republican told me last week they look forward to moderate Democratic House candidates trying to downplay their affiliation with him and his voting record. We'll see if that actually becomes an issue.

Meanwhile, Luján said he's studying the national political terrain and ready to jump enthusiastically into the new job. But he promises he'll always keep his feet in New Mexico.

"My dad (the late New Mexico House Speaker Ben Lujan) taught me the importance of taking care of the farm and home," Luján said. "That is my home. My mom is home. I have responsibility to her and I'm never going to abandon that. New Mexico is where I was born and raised, and I will never, ever abandon New Mexico.

"I'm always grounded," he added.

The next day, the White House called. They wanted Luján to join Obama on Air Force One for his trip to Nevada, where he would speak about immigration.

Flying out west on the president's fabled airplane high above the clouds on Friday, it's unclear if Luján could see New Mexico in the distance.

Walter Rubel: Lujan has just been given the toughest job in Congress

BYLINE: Las Cruces Sun-News

SECTION: OPINION

LENGTH: 641 words

As the son of the second-most powerful man in New Mexico, who shares his name, the skids were well lubricated for Ben Ray Lujan in 2004 when he ran for a seat on the Public Regulation Commission.

Lujan uses his middle name to distinguish himself from his once-more-famous father, who served as speaker of the House from 2001 to 2012, and wielded enormous influence over that body. A graduate of Highlands University after having earlier left UNM, the young Lujan was elevated to chairman soon after being elected to the PRC.

The PRC has always had its share of controversies and scandals, but none touched Lujan. And so, when Tom Udall gave up his House seat in 2008 to run for the Senate seat being vacated by Pete Domenici, the timing was perfect for Lujan, who was just completing his first term on the PRC.

Lujan defeated five other challengers in the Democratic primary, topping his nearest rival by 16 points. He then won easily in a general election that included an independent candidate who tallied 13 percent of the vote. Despite the three-way split, Lujan won comfortably with 57 percent.

Running in a reliably Democratic district, Lujan has never been seriously challenged since. He just beat opponent Jefferson L. Byrd by more than 23 points in what was a Republican wave election.

I'm sure there has been a lot of hard work and late nights along the way. But looking on from afar, it's all seemed to come incredibly easily for Lujan, who will soon begin his fourth term in Congress at 42 years old.

But now he has just accepted what may be the most difficult job in Washington. Lujan was named last week to succeed Steve Israel of New York as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

It will now be his job to bring the Democrats back to power in the U.S. House of Representatives. So much for that impeccable timing discussed earlier.

Democrats have been out of power in the House since 2010, and are trending in the wrong direction. They just lost 12 more seats this month, giving Republicans their largest majority in the House since 1931.

The advantage Republicans now hold gives them a fairly large cushion for the inevitable over-reach to come, followed by the just-as-inevitable backlash from voters. Especially when you factor in gerrymandered districts that will remain in place at least through the next census.

Lujan has a "bold vision and determined leadership to deliver wins in difficult districts," Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said during a news conference Monday, as reported by Politico.

The selection of Lujan came as a surprise. A group of wealthy liberal donors wanted Donna Edwards of Maryland. Jim Himes of Connecticut, Jared Polis of Colorado and Joaquin Castro of Texas were also in the running, Politico reported.

The National Journal has ranked Lujan the 62nd most liberal member of the House. His selection "has signaled an intention to continue its outreach to progressives and Hispanics, with the party eager to make up ground for the net loss of at least 66 seats since 2010," National Journal reporter Billy House wrote.

Lujan has not been a regular guest on the Sunday morning shows or nightly cable news food fights until now, but that's about to change.

He will now be called on frequently to explain Democratic positions in a way that resonates with voters. Beyond that, it will be his job to recruit candidates and develop a national strategy to win back the House.

It was a terrific story Monday night, with Lujan blowing kisses through the TV camera to his mother in Nambc. He is suddenly the fresh, new face of the Democratic Party. Which also makes him the newest target for Republicans and conservative media.

His life just got a whole lot more interesting.

Congressional Votes for New Mexico the Week of 11/14 - 11/20/2014

BYLINE: by TARGETED NEWS SERVICE, Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 2535 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21 -- There were seven key votes in the House this week; the House held a total of 14 roll call votes in the week ending Thursday. There were seven key votes in the Senate, which held a total of 15 roll call votes. The most important House vote was to pass a bill to approve the Keystone XL pipeline; the most important Senate vote was to reject the Keystone XL bill.

In addition to roll call votes, the House and Senate also took action on several measures by voice vote. The House also passed the Low-Dose Radiation Research Act (H.R. 5544), sponsored by Rep. Paul C. Broun, R-Ga., to increase the understanding of the health effects of low doses of ionizing radiation; the Federal Duck Stamp Act (H.R. 5069), sponsored by Rep. John Fleming, R-La., to increase the price of duck stamps to fund the acquisition of conservation easements for migratory birds; the Girls Count Act (H.R. 3398), sponsored by Rep. Steve Chabot, R-Ohio, to authorize measures to support the rights of women and girls in developing countries; and the Malala Yousafzai Scholarship Act (H.R. 3583), sponsored by Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Fla., to expand the number of scholarships available to Pakistani women under the Merit and Needs-Based Scholarship Program.

The Senate also passed the Sudden Unexpected Death Data Enhancement and Awareness Act (H.R. 669), sponsored by Rep. Frank Pallone Jr., D-N.J., to improve understanding and awareness of unexpected sudden death in infants; a bill (H.R. 4067), sponsored by Rep. Lynn Jenkins, R-Kan., to extend through 2014 the enforcement instruction on supervision requirements for outpatient therapeutic services in critical access and small rural hospitals; a bill (H.R. 5441), sponsored by Rep. Jeff Miller, R-Fla., to amend the federal charter of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States to reflect the service of women in the military; and the STELA Reauthorization Act (H.R. 5728), sponsored by Rep. Fred Upton, R-Mich., to extend expiring provisions relating to the retransmission of signals of television broadcast stations.

Here's a look at how area members of Congress voted over the previous week.

HOUSE VOTES:

House Vote 1:

APPROVING KEYSTONE XL PIPELINE: The House has passed a bill (H.R. 5682) sponsored by Rep. Bill Cassidy, R-La., that would authorize TransCanada to construct its proposed Keystone XL pipeline to carry oil from Alberta into the U.S. and declare that environmental reviews for the pipeline are complete. Cassidy said building the pipeline would create more than 40,000 jobs and increase energy security. Cassidy added that Keystone XL was supported by the states that would host the pipeline and by a majority of Americans. A bill opponent, Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., said: "This bill will not lower gasoline prices by a single penny. It may even raise them in some places. It will, at most, create just a few dozen permanent jobs" while disrupting the environmental review process for Keystone XL and worsening climate change by increasing greenhouse gas emissions. The vote, on Nov. 14, was 252 yeas to 161 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 2:

CHANGING EPA SCIENCE ADVISORY BOARD: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Chris Stewart, R-Utah, to the EPA Science Advisory Board Reform Act (H.R. 1422). The amendment would state that EPA's Science Advisory Board "shall be fully and timely responsive to Congress" and make technical changes to the bill. Stewart said the changes were "critical to ensure that the underlying bill can be properly applied to existing statute" without interpretive conflicts. An amendment opponent, Rep. Suzanne Bonamici, D-Ore., said the "fully and timely responsive to Congress" clause would make the board vulnerable to interference from Congress, reducing its ability to independently advise the EPA. The vote, on Nov. 18, was 232 yeas to 184 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 3:

REGULATING EPA SCIENCE ADVISORY BOARD: The House has passed the EPA Science Advisory Board Reform Act (H.R. 1422), sponsored by Rep. Chris Stewart, R-Utah. The bill would set out eligibility and disclosure requirements for members of the Environmental Protection Agency's Science Advisory Board, including education and professional experience standards, and require the EPA to solicit public nominations for board members. Stewart said the requirements would improve the impartiality of board members, many of whom are recent recipients of EPA grants, and improve the balance of points of view represented on the board. A bill opponent, Rep. Suzanne Bonamici, D-Ore., said it would place too many industry representatives on the board, had excessively stringent standards for excluding academic scientists from the board if they had dealings with the EPA, and would apply cumbersome new procedural standards on the board. The vote, on Nov. 18, was 229 yeas to 191 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 4:

STANDARDS FOR RESEARCH SUPPORTING EPA RULES: The House has rejected an amendment sponsored by Rep. Joseph P. Kennedy III, D-Mass., to the Secret Science Reform Act (H.R. 4012). The amendment would have authorized the Environmental Protection Agency to use any peer-reviewed scientific publication, including publications based on data that is prohibited from public disclosure, in considering whether to propose regulations. Kennedy said the amendment sought to replace an unworkable standard for the EPA with a standard that allows the agency to "use the best scientific information available, so long as that data complies with the highest academic peer-review protocols." An amendment opponent, Rep. David Schweikert, R-Ariz., said a peer review standard was insufficient because peers do not have access to the data underlying the scientific research they review. The vote, on Nov. 19, was 194 yeas to 230 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

NAYS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 5:

RELEASE OF DATA JUSTIFYING EPA REGULATIONS: The House has passed the Secret Science Reform Act (H.R. 4012), sponsored by Rep. David Schweikert, R-Ariz. The bill would require regulations and other measures enacted by the Environmental Protection Agency to be backed by publicly available scientific and technical information. Schweikert said that increasing disclosure of the research used by the EPA in adopting regulations would improve environmental and health policies. A bill opponent, Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., said confidentiality concerns justified keeping some information private. The vote, on Nov. 19, was 237 yeas to 190 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 6:

AIR QUALITY PERMITTING PROCESS: The House has rejected an amendment sponsored by Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., to the Promoting New Manufacturing Act (H.R. 4795). The amendment would have exempted the EPA and state and local regulators from the bill's national ambient air quality standard implementation guidance requirement in the event that the regulators find that meeting the requirement would increase air pollution or delay the process of issuing air quality permits. Waxman said the exemption would serve as "a safety hatch to make sure that we aren't harming public health and making air pollution permitting more difficult." An amendment opponent, Rep. Ed Whitfield, R-Ky., said adding the amendment would defeat the purpose of the bill, which is to improve regulatory certainty for manufacturers planning to expand. The vote, on Nov. 20, was 183 yeas to 225 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

NAYS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 7:

EPA AIR QUALITY REGULATIONS: The House has passed the Promoting New Manufacturing Act (H.R. 4795), sponsored by Rep. Steve Scalise, R-La. The bill would Environmental Protection Agency to publish on its website information about preconstruction permits it has issued, since 2008, to major sources of air pollutants under the Clean Air Act's New Source Review Program, and require the EPA to publish regulations and guidance for implementing rules that establish or revise national ambient air quality (NAAQ) standards. Scalise said that by increasing transparency at the EPA, the bill would improve regulatory certainty for manufacturers as they go through the permitting process for building new facilities, with resulting benefits for the economy. A bill opponent, Rep. Gene Green, D-Texas, said that by imposing a lengthy delay in the implementation of NAAQ standards, the bill would disrupt the regulatory process, and it would fail to adequately protect public health. The vote, on Nov. 20, was 238 yeas to 172 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

SENATE VOTES:

Senate Vote 1:

CHILD CARE GRANTS: The Senate has concurred in the House amendment to the Child Care and Development Block Grant Act (S. 1086), sponsored by Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, D-Md. The bill would reauthorize through fiscal 2020 the government's program of issuing child care and development block grants to the states, require criminal background checks of child care providers, and require states to submit three-year child care and development plans to receive grants. A bill supporter, Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, said it would enable "important reforms and improvements" of care and education for pre-kindergarten children, assisting their development at a critical time for mental growth and thereby helping them reach their full potential. The vote, on Nov. 17, was 88 yeas to 1 nay.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 2:

APPROVING KEYSTONE XL PIPELINE: The Senate has rejected a bill (S. 2280), sponsored by Sen. John Hoeven, R-N.D., that would have authorized TransCanada to construct its proposed Keystone XL pipeline to carry oil from Alberta into the U.S. and declared that environmental reviews for the pipeline were complete. Hoeven said approving Keystone XL would enhance national security by improving U.S. reliance on energy imports from its close ally, Canada, rather than the Middle East or other areas hostile to the U.S., support economic growth, and generate tax revenue for the government. A bill opponent, Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., said it would "force the approval of a project that will bring millions of barrels of the dirtiest pollution you could think of into America." The vote, on Nov. 18, was 59 yeas to 41 nays, with a three-fifths majority needed for passage.

NAYS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 3:

JUDGE FOR MIDDLE DISTRICT OF GEORGIA: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Leslie Joyce Abrams to serve as a U.S. District Judge for the Middle District of Georgia. A supporter, Sen. Johnny Isakson, R-Ga., praised Abrams, currently an assistant attorney in the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of Georgia, and formerly a private practice lawyer at two law firms, as an extremely competent, talented individual who will do well in her new role. The vote, on Nov. 18, was unanimous with 100 yeas.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 4:

REVIEW OF SURVEILLANCE EFFORTS: The Senate has rejected a cloture motion to end debate on the USA Freedom Act (S. 2685), sponsored by Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, D-Vt. The bill would have established new review standards for FBI surveillance requests submitted to Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) courts that seek approval from the FISA courts for surveillance of suspected terrorists, criminals, or for clandestine foreign intelligence activities. Leahy said the bill "enhances privacy protections and ends indiscriminate data collection by the NSA, but also keeps the essential tools our intelligence community needs to protect our nation." A bill opponent, Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., said it would halt the FBI's program of collecting metadata for phone records, with a resulting impairment of the FBI's ability to learn about terrorist plots and stop the plots before they are enacted. The vote, on Nov. 18, was 58 yeas to 42 nays, with a three-fifths majority required to end debate.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 5:

WISCONSIN DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Pamela Pepper to serve as a U.S. District Judge for the Eastern District of Wisconsin. Pepper, who has served as a judge in the district's bankruptcy court since 2005, also served as a bankruptcy judge in the Southern District of Illinois from 2005 to 2009, and previously worked as a private practice criminal defense attorney and assistant U.S. attorney. Although there was no floor debate on Pepper's nomination, Sen. Ron Johnson, R-Wis., said in a statement that Pepper's "intellectual curiosity, compassion and faithful adherence to the rule of law will serve the nation and the people of Wisconsin's eastern district well." The vote, on Nov. 20, was unanimous with 95 yeas.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 6:

NEW YORK DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Brenda K. Sannes to serve as a U.S. District Judge for the Northern District of New York. Sannes has served as an assistant U.S. attorney in the district since 1995, including service as chief of its appellate section since 2005, and previously worked as an assistant U.S. attorney in California and as a private practice lawyer. There was no floor debate on the nomination, but Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., said in a statement that Sannes "has shown real leadership and legal acumen - and she certainly has the expertise and the experience to capably fill a seat on the federal bench." The vote, on Nov. 20, was unanimous with 96 yeas.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 7:

CONNECTICUT DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Victor Allen Bolden to serve as a U.S. District Judge for the District of Connecticut. A supporter, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, D-Vt., said Bolden had impeccable credentials, including five years of experience as corporation counsel for New Haven, Conn., and work as general counsel and assistant counsel for the NAACP's Legal Defense & Educational Fund and as a private practice lawyer. Leahy also praised Bolden for his work ensuring that New Haven complied with a Supreme Court order for the city to ensure racial nondiscrimination in its process for evaluated whether to promote its firefighters. No senators spoke against Bolden's nomination on the Senate floor. The vote, on Nov. 20, was 49 yeas to 46 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

NAYS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM

Gov. jumps into immigration debate

BYLINE: JAMES MONTELEONE Politics Notebook

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C2

LENGTH: 407 words

Gov. Susana Martinez jumped into the national immigration debate this week with an op-ed published in the Washington Times that called on Congress to find a bipartisan solution.

"Until our representatives in Washington stop acting like politicians and start leading, the immigration issue will continue to go unaddressed," Martinez wrote. "...Until they act, our immigration problem will continue to severely impact the states, leaving border governors like me to deal with another Washington failure."

Martinez's article, published Tuesday by the Republican-leaning Washington newspaper, comes as Democratic President Barack Obama prepares to announce an executive order expected to expand the number of immigrants in the U.S. illegally who are eligible for deferred deportation action status.

Martinez also touted her own efforts to repeal the New Mexico law that provides driver's licenses to immigrants in the country illegally, alongside jabs at former Gov. Bill Richardson.

STILL FUNDRAISING:

Campaign 2014 may have ended, but the Democratic Party of New Mexico still is beating the bushes to drum up a little more cash to aid one of their candidates.

The party, in an email to donors this week, asked supporters to chip in again to help Land Commissioner Ray Powell in his vote recount. Unofficial poll returns showed Powell trailing Republican opponent Aubrey Dunn by fewer than 1,000 votes, triggering an automatic state-funded recount.

"Help Ray Powell stay in office," the fundraising email said.

Donations will go toward legal expenses associated with the recount effort in Powell's race, state party Executive Director Jon Lipshutz said. The money also might go toward other "ancillary costs" related to getting party volunteers to the Secretary of State's Office in Santa Fe to monitor the recount procedures, he said.

LEADERSHIP RANKS:

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., was tapped to serve as a vice chairwoman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus.

Lujan Grisham's appointment to the leadership role continues New Mexico's representation in the group's leadership. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., previously served as chairman of the caucus before being named this week as the head of the national Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the campaign arm of the Democratic caucus designed to help elect House Democrats. The new chairwoman of the Hispanic caucus is Rep. Linda Sánchez, D-Calif.

Kelly Ward Will Stay on as DCCC Executive Director

BYLINE: By Emily Cahn and Abby Livingston

LENGTH: 338 words

Newly minted Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Ben Ray Luján said Thursday that Kelly Ward will stay on as executive director of the committee for the second straight cycle.

Luján said in an interview with CQ Roll Call earlier this week he hoped Ward would remain for another stint at the top of the committee - tasked with helping Democrats as they try to regain a majority of seats in the House. On Thursday, Luján announced Ward accepted the position, and noted she is the first person to spend two consecutive cycles at DCCC leader.

"Kelly Ward brings infectious energy, unrivaled determination and key strategic insights to her job, and I am so pleased that she has agreed to stay on at the DCCC," Luján said in a news release. "After working with Kelly for the past two years, I've been so impressed with her ability to both develop the strategy and operationalize the day-to-day work needed to aggressively take the fight to Republicans, and we're lucky to have her lead our team."

This will be Ward's fourth cycle at the committee. She started in 2010 as incumbent retention director. In 2012, she was promoted to political director. And in 2014, former DCCC Chairman Steve Israel named her executive director.

Ward said she's excited for another cycle.

"I'm lucky to have worked with Chairman Israel as we weathered a storm that could have been worse in 2014, and I look forward to building on the fundamentals we have in place for a successful election night in 2016," she said in the release.

House Democrats have a tough task, given they just lost a net of at least 12 seats - with one race in Arizona headed to a recount.

DCCC: DCCC Chairman Ben Ray Lujan Names Kelly Ward as Executive Director

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 499 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee issued the following news release:

DCCC Chairman Ben Ray Lujan announced today that DCCC Executive Director Kelly Ward will serve as Executive Director for the 2016 cycle, continuing to bring her savvy political instincts and organizational skills to the committee for another cycle. Ward, a DCCC veteran, House strategist and skilled political operative, is the first Executive Director in recent memory to serve for a second election cycle. Politico has called Ward a "quietly effective behind-the-scenes operator" and a "motivating force" at the DCCC. Under Ward's leadership with outgoing Chairman Steve Israel, the DCCC outraised the NRCC by $41 million, despite being in the minority, and launched the largest ad buy from any group in the House or the Senate campaigns.

"Kelly Ward brings infectious energy, unrivaled determination and key strategic insights to her job, and I am so pleased that she has agreed to stay on at the DCCC," DCCC Chairman Ben Ray Lujan said. "After working with Kelly for the past two years, I've been so impressed with her ability to both develop the strategy and operationalize the day-to-day work needed to aggressively take the fight to Republicans, and we're lucky to have her lead our team."

In the tough climate of 2014, House Democrats held losses well below the historic average for the President's midterm and even picked up three Republican-held seats. The DCCC won 46 percent of the "Toss Up" races from Rothenberg and 38 percent of the "Toss Up" races from the Cook Report. Nearly half (47 percent) of the DCCC IE dollars were invested in races that House Democrats won. Democrats won 17 of the 26 races that were decided by less than 5 points.

Ward said: "I'm honored to be working with Chairman Lujan and House Democrats, who are committed to expanding our ranks, holding Republicans accountable and strengthening the middle class. I'm lucky to have worked with Chairman Israel as we weathered a storm that could have been worse in 2014, and I look forward to building on the fundamentals we have in place for a successful election night in 2016."

Ward has served as the DCCC's Executive Director since November 2012. Before becoming Executive Director, Ward served as the DCCC's Political Director, where she oversaw candidate redistricting, recruitment, campaign planning and strategy, leading to victory in 78 percent of the seats considered Toss Up by the Rothenberg Report and 69 percent of the seats considered Toss Up by the Cook Political Report. She previously managed Alan Khazei's U.S. Senate campaign, ran former Congressman Harry Mitchell's first congressional campaign, ran several nonprofit advocacy campaigns and worked for former Arizona Governor Janet Napolitano. She earned her undergraduate degree from the University of Arizona and has her Master's Degree from Harvard's Kennedy School of Government.

DCCC : Quick Clip: DCCC Chairman Ben Ray Lujan on MSNBC on the President's Immigration Action

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 174 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee issued the following news release:

On MSNBC's Rachel Maddow (http://youtu.be/Chw9jAn5KsQ) Show last night, DCCC Chairman Ben Ray Lujan said that President Obama has taken an important first step on immigration, and that House Republicans need to stop stalling comprehensive reform, as they have for more than 500 days.

On President Obama's actions on immigration reform, Chairman Lujan said: "This is the first step, and the President's taken an important step, but it's the first step. I hope that House Republicans use the rest of this year to move comprehensive immigration reform because it's House Republicans that have been stalling this bill for 510 days. Republicans have a chance to act, but sadly we're hearing more and more talk from Republicans about a government shutdown. I'm certainly hopeful they're listening to the American people because the American people do not want the government shut down."

Luján Pledges to Bring Farmer's Work Ethic to DCCC

BYLINE: By Emma Dumain

LENGTH: 1255 words

Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who has ruffled plenty of feathers lately, reclaimed some goodwill with her caucus Monday, bypassing more established members to name Ben Ray Luján the next chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

It won't erase all of the negativity percolating among her flock - demoralized after Election Day and antsy over the stasis at the leadership table - but the decision to elevate the New Mexico Democrat is being called "smart" and "savvy," even by those who count themselves among Pelosi's critics.

Rep. Maxine Waters of California, a member of the Congressional Black Caucus and the top Democrat on Financial Services, said Pelosi's pick was "refreshing" and "lovely."

"He was not talked about as one of the usual suspects," Waters told CQ Roll Call. "It shows a recognition that someone who shows promise should be given opportunities," even if that person isn't the loudest or the most demonstrative.

Rep. Marcy Kaptur of Ohio said she was "pleasantly surprised" by the selection, predicting Luján would "ingratiate himself" in a way that other DCCC chairmen had not. (She grimaced when recalling the tenure of now-Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel, whom she called "power driven.")

Rep. Marcia L. Fudge, D-Ohio, the outgoing chairwoman of the CBC who has never been shy in expressing consternation about Rep. Steve Israel's DCCC leadership, said all members will be able to work with Luján.

A former House Democratic aide who worked closely with Luján's office said he truly represents the future of House Democratic leaders: "There's a certain group of mid-level management members who always get referred to as 'the next generation,' but he is the first to come after them."

In the 114th Congress, he will be the only completely new face in the senior leadership ranks, and the only one who was elected after the Democratic wave of 2006.

Elected in 2008, Luján is relatively new to Congress, but not so new that he'll be criticized for leapfrogging members who have done their time and paid their dues. He's not a media darling or a Sunday show regular, but that means he's avoided the kind of scrutiny that's dogged the three members who were at one point considered front-runners for the job: Reps. Donna Edwards of Maryland, Jim Himes of Connecticut and Jared Polis of Colorado.

Luján isn't a household name outside of Washington, D.C., but that's part of what's made him so well-regarded among his colleagues.

Members, staffers and political observers describe him as low-key and unassuming, someone who puts his head down and does his job, and who doesn't care whether the task at hand is exciting or glamorous. One Democratic aide said he never misses meetings or appointments, and it's that perfect attendance record and positive attitude that gets noticed in a town that likes to reward happy warriors.

In an interview with CQ Roll Call Tuesday, Luján attributed his legislative style to the examples set by his parents, especially his father, the late Ben Luján, who served as speaker of the New Mexico House.

"My father ... always respected members, he always respected people," Lujan said. "Mom and Dad always raised me that way: You respect your elders, you respect your neighbors and you treat your family with respect and dignity. And that's how I've translated my work in the Congress."

He chalked up his work ethic to his upbringing on a farm.

"No job was too small," Luján said. "You did it all. When I was very young in age, milking goats. Still to this day ... cleaning the pens. You can imagine all that that entails. Cutting grass, cutting wood, stacking wood, doing what I need to do, and so I bring that same work ethic to the Congress of what we need to do: No job is too small, no job is too large, you need to roll up your sleeves and be willing to do everything that you're asking others to do, and do it to the best of your ability and hope you succeed."

But being likable and hard-working isn't enough to successfully run an operation like the DCCC, and not everyone's sure whether Luján has what it takes to recruit the right candidates, raise the most money and build the infrastructure to win back seats in 2016.

Sources familiar with the third-term congressman say he's more than capable, especially when it comes to bringing people together and building consensus around a compelling message - something many House Democrats think the party lacked this cycle. He's progressive, but can talk about the issues in a way that doesn't alienate moderates; and at 42, he's seen as someone who can bridge the gap between older and younger members.

As a Latino, he'll represent a departure from the past eight years of white men leading the House Democrats' top fundraising machine.

In terms of experience, he has proved he can raise money. As the recent chairman of BOLD PAC, which raises money on behalf of CHC members and candidates, Luján raised nearly $1.7 million over two cycles, a PAC record.

And he's no stranger to the DCCC: In the 2014 cycle, he was co-chairman of both the Latino and Tribal councils, and he served on the Campaign Services and Recruitment committees.

Pelosi's decision to tap Luján was something of a surprise to political observers, who expected the California Democrat to pick one of the more obvious contenders actively lobbying for the job. It was also something of a surprise to Luján, who had only been discussing the position with Pelosi for about a week prior to the announcement. He said he learned he'd gotten the job about two hours before the scheduled news conference where Pelosi revealed her selection.

"I responded to the leader that although I was not pursuing this, I'm willing to do the work and take whatever role and responsibility it is that I need to, to help my colleagues and make sure we're reaching out to the American people," Luján said of his initial conversation with Pelosi.

Less than 24 hours after getting the assignment, Luján is already being called "the chairman" by staff, and he spent Tuesday being trailed across Capitol Hill by a member of the DCCC press team.

Though many House Democrats said they want a more inclusive and collaborative DCCC for the 2016 cycle, Luján didn't seem eager to reinvent the wheel. He praised Israel as someone who "set the expectations very high" and suggested he'd like to retain Kelly Ward, the current executive director.

As for his expectations in terms of electoral possibilities, Luján is going on the record early with a prediction that House Democrats stand to win.

"Look, I think we're going to have our work before us, but I'm optimistic," he said. "I see gains. I see an electorate we can reach out to. The same way I was born and raised rolling up my sleeves and getting to work, that's what the American people want to hear and see."

Lujan Chairmanship Earns Pelosi Praise

BYLINE: Jack Fitzpatrick

LENGTH: 105 words

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan's (D-NM 03) selection as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee earned House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-CA 12) some goodwill among her critics, including Rep. Maxine Waters (D-CA 43), who said, "He was not talked about as one of the usual suspects. It shows a recognition that someone who shows promise should be given opportunities."

Lujan said he did not actively seek the position, but was approached by Pelosi and said he was "willing to do the work" if selected. (Roll Call)

Lujan said he hopes current DCCC executive director Kelly Ward stays on for the 2016 cycle. (Roll Call)

THE RACHEL MADDOW SHOW for November 19, 2014

BYLINE: Rachel Maddow

GUESTS: Ben Ray Lujan, Cristina Jimenez

SECTION: NEWS; Domestic

LENGTH: 7661 words

HIGHLIGHT: In a primetime address tomorrow before the nation, the president of the United States will declare his plans to protect what could be up to 5 million people from deportation. Interview with U.S. Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico.

CHRIS HAYES, "ALL IN" HOST: That is "ALL IN" for this evening.

THE RACHEL MADDOW SHOW starts right now.

Good evening, Rachel.

RACHEL MADDOW, MSNBC HOST: Good evening, Chris. Thank you.

HAYES: You bet.

MADDOW: Thanks to you at home for joining us this hour.

Do you remember a guy named Randy Scheunemann? Randy Scheunemann, he was the top policy adviser to the McCain/Palin campaign in 2008. That`s him, the guy with the beard there.

He doesn`t have that memorable a face -- I don`t mean that in a bad way. I just mean, he doesn`t -- you don`t see him and instantly know who he is. He also has a names that is kind of hard to pronounce, definitely hard to spell.

Honestly, Randy Scheunemann has never been a super famous guy in politics. He did really pop in the news one time that you might remember because it was a scandal in that presidential campaign. When John McCain was running for president, you might remember that Russia started a war with the nation of Georgia. You might further remember that John McCain, as a candidate for president, came out when that war started and said, "We are all Georgians now."

John McCain was pledging, basically, that if he were president, the United States would act as if we were Georgia. We, America, would go to war with Russia on behalf of this other country.

And at the time that John McCain presidential candidate was pledging a war with Russia because we are all Georgians now, at the time that he was doing that, the lobbying firm of his top foreign policy adviser Randy Scheunemann had just been hired and put on the payroll by the nation of Georgia. That`s the one time you might remember Randy Scheunemann. The guy whose lobbying fee is very easily -- might have gotten the United States military into a shooting war with Russia.

But McCain did not win the presidency and Randy Scheunemann went back to a standard Washington foreign policy guy. And you don`t hear much about him anymore. You haven`t heard much about him since then -- until this week.

Until this week, a really, really weird story about Randy Scheunemann was broken by "The Daily Beast". It turns out, Randy Scheunemann belongs to a private skiing club in Montana. I did not know there was such a thing as a private skiing club. I thought like, you know, you buy a lift ticket, then you go ski on a mountain with other people who are skiing on the mountain and that`s skiing.

I -- apparently, there are places you can do it privately without the riffraff and Randy Scheunemann apparently belongs to one of those. And on the ski left, at his private skiing lift, "The Daily Beast" and a number of other outlets now report that Randy Scheunemann got into a fight. He got into a fight on the ski lift with a white supremacist, specifically with this guy, who is sort of America`s foremost white supremacist.

This is a guy named Richard Spencer. He was recently forcibly deported from Budapest when he tried to organize and international white supremacist conference and the nation of Hungary caught him trying to sneak into their country even though they had banned him. He calls for the creation of a white homeland. He runs an organization called the National Policy Institute, to try to advance the goal of a white homeland. His group is based in Whitefish, Montana.

He`s also founded a few online white supremacist magazines and Web sites, including this one which is called Alternative Right.

And apparently making a career as a white supremacist leader these days is a pretty remunerative thing. At least the dude is making enough money to belong to the same private ski club that Randy Scheunemann does in Montana. Who even knew there were private ski clubs? Anyway, there are. And apparently, the two of them got on a fight on the ski lift.

Insults were exchanged, punches were threatened. And the reason it all broke in the news this week is that private ski club in Montana, it`s called the Big Mountain Club, they apparently in this fight between two of their members felt they had to decide between them, which of these two guys was going to be allowed to stay as a member of their private ski club. Randy Scheunemann, Washington policy adviser guy, adviser to John McCain, or the Aryan Nation white supremacist guy who is trying to build a homeland for the endangered white race from his home base in Montana.

The Big Mountain Club in Whitefish, Montana, decided they`d go with the white supremacist. They kicked Randy Scheunemann out and kept the Ku Klux other guy, yes!

And so, now, in the wake of that, you have Whitefish, Montana, City Council meetings that have suddenly gotten very crowded. They look like this, totally packed with local residents who apparently realize they have the leader of a white nationalist movement living in their town getting in fights on their ski lifts.

Local anti-racist effort has sprung up in Whitefish. They`re trying to figure out some way to force this guy out or maybe pass an anti- discrimination ordinance that would annoy the guy enough that he might leave on his own. There`s big to do in Montana.

But what happened in that ski lift fight between the Washington establishment guy and the kook out there white wing fringe guy -- I mean, despite the fact that amazingly the kook right wing fringe guy appears to have won, what is amazing about that story being in the news right now is that that ski lift fight is basically a tiny snowy pageant version, like the winter passion play version of what`s happening in Washington right now between the mainstream establishment Randy Scheunemann types and the fringy guys who keep beating them in fights.

The white supremacist guy who got in the fight with Randy Scheunemann is basically organizing for an international race war, or at least telling people to prepare for the international race war that he certainly thinks is coming, and he definitely hopes is coming. He wants to build a white homeland.

If you look at the online racist forums and magazines that he started, some of it tries to appear sort of academic, sort of pundit-y, right? This new variety of white supremacy tries to play at trying to appear like they are mainstream. Sometimes, though, the real thing just slips through.

This is one of the blog posts at Alternative Right, this thing that Richard Spencer founded. This is a post they put up on Holocaust Remembrance Day last year. As you can see they`ve titled it Holocaust Amnesia Day.

And then under a picture of a stack of corpses, people killed in the Holocaust, the post says sarcastically, "I cannot believe it has crept up on me again. Today, I discovered it`s Holocaust Memorial Day and I`m fresh out of onions." The implication is how am I going to force myself to pretend to cry over the Holocaust which may or may not have happened? Yes.

This is Alternative Right. This is the guy who fought with Randy Scheunemann on the ski lift in Montana and who the town of Whitefish, Montana, is now freaking out about him running his white supremacist business out of their town.

Another person who has written at Richard Spencer`s Alternative Right is this guy. His name is Jason Richwine. You see the post is called model minority? This is Jason Richwine`s posts at Alternative Right.

This one happens to be about how Hispanics are inherently disposed to criminal behavior. He argues in this post that you can statistically control for all other factors and you still end up with this racial innate truth that Hispanics are just more criminally minded than white people are.

This is Jason Richwine. He also does this pseudo academic white supremacist stuff in other places. He wrote a doctoral dissertation called "IQ and Immigration Policy", at Harvard in which he tried to make the academic case that non-white people are just genetically inferior when it comes to intelligence. And therefore, he argued, immigration policy should basically be managed to keep America as white as possible if we know what`s good for us.

Quote, "The average IQ of immigrants in the United States is substantially lower than that of the white native population. And the difference is likely to persist over several generations." Quote, "No one knows whether Hispanics will reach IQ parity with whites, but the prediction that new Hispanic immigrants will have low IQ children and grandchildren is difficult to argue against."

Then, he goes on to Richard Spencer`s Alternative Right and explains how Hispanics are inherently criminal, then in his career somehow he crosses over into supposedly respectable right wing thing tank land and he continues making the same case.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JASON RICHWINE, AMERICAN ENTERPRISE INSTITUTE: Race is different in all sorts of ways. Probably the most important way is in IQ. Decades of psychometric testing has indicated that at least in America, you have Jews with the highest average IQ usually followed by East Asian, and then you have non-Jewish whites, Hispanics and then black Americans. These are real differences. They`re not going to go away tomorrow. And for that reason, we have to address them in our immigration discussions and our debates.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MADDOW: You can just rank the races by intelligence. Black people and Hispanic people are just inherently stupid -- inherently stupider than white people, at least. This is just the facts. These are real differences.

Generation to generation to generation, it`s never going to go away. It`s racially inherent. So, you ought to think about that when devising your immigration policy. Think about race because you want to make sure that you don`t have -- it`s disgusting, right?

In the 2012 election, Republicans did poorly. President Obama got re- elected, Democrats picked up seats in the House and Senate.

One of the Republican senators who was not up for re-election that year in 2012 but who was still seemed to be a very safe seat and a probably former leader in his party, was Senator Jim DeMint of South Carolina. Right after the 2012 election, Jim DeMint of South Carolina surprised everyone by quitting the United States Senate. He quit right in the middle of his second term because he said, instead he had wanted to go run the Heritage Foundation. Screw this Senate thing. I want real power.

You might remember after the 2012 losses for the Republican Party, they did an autopsy report where they decided that the party should reach out to more minorities and even though the people who wrote the autopsy report were not supposed to consider any specific policy measures, they said they couldn`t resist, they unanimously recommended that the Republican Party endorse and champion immigration reform.

Jim DeMint said to heck with that, he quit the party and went to run the Heritage Foundation, which he then turned into the main conservative institution fighting against that, fighting against immigration reform and specifically taking on the mission of making sure that no elected Republicans would actually support immigration reform. He would not only draw the line, he would hold the line.

And to start that process once he was in his new job, Jim DeMint hired good Old Jason Richwine as a senior policy analyst at the Heritage Foundation, and got Jason Richwine to be one of the two authors on this Heritage Foundation report on why it would be a terrible thing, a fiscally disastrous thing for America to reform immigration law. Jason Richwine, the guy who posted the white supremacist Web sites, who says you can rank groups according to their IQ. Black and brown are inherently criminal and they`re at the bottom racially speaking when it comes to intelligence.

Jim DeMint had him look at what immigration reform would mean for our country. And it turns out, when Jason Richwine looks at something like that, he thinks it`s a bad idea. Jason Richwine decided that immigration reform would be very expensive for our nation.

He crunched the numbers and decided that it would cost the American taxpayers $6.3 trillion. Trillion. Trill -- 6 point -- it would be the cost of going to the moon and back a thousand times. That`s what his calculating machine says when he was asked to calculate the cost. That said, his calculating machine was built in a beer hall in Bavaria in 1923, so maybe it doesn`t count that well anymore.

Thanks to reporting first at "The Washington Post," then some other places, it pretty quickly came out that Jason Richwine, this guy who the Heritage Foundation had hired to write this report, had a long history of white supremacist writings.

And when that all came out, Heritage did not fire him. They allowed him to quietly resign.

It was an interesting thing sort of in terms of the history of all this. I`m not sure it seemed all that important at the time but now, it seems important. They never rescinded the Jason Richwine report. This is still the Heritage Foundation`s official analysis of immigration reform in America and what it would cost based on Jason Richwine`s eugenicist methodology. And, of course, it suggests that the reason it would be so costly is immigration reform is because immigrants are a terribly costly thing to our nation because they`re inherently racially interior to white people and they`d never contribute economically to this country because they`re essentially, you know, sort of subhuman, at least sub-white. They`ll always be economic parasites because, you know, brown.

That is the Heritage Foundation position on immigration reform. They never rescinded that report. They never fired the guy either. He did resign.

And the Heritage Foundation is implacably opposed to any immigration reform because of what they think of immigrants. And the Heritage Foundation has won the argument with the Republican Party on this. You remember after 2012, the Republican Party was going to embrace officially, was going to embrace and champion immigration reform.

There are now only two years later no Republicans in positions of power in national politics who are in favor of immigration reform. Jim DeMint has won on that.

And now, that President Obama has today announced that he will move forward on his own to reform as much of the immigration form as he can without Congress, now that President Obama has today announced that tomorrow night, in a primetime address, he will announce and describe and make the case for those policy changes, now, Jim DeMint and his group no longer have to fight to try to hold Republicans in line in terms of being against immigration reform. They`ve already done that. They`ve already won that fight with the Republican.

Now what they have to do is lead Republican strategy for how to fight President Obama who is going to do this. And what they decided they want is a government shutdown. No blank check for amnesty.

A lame duck Congress has to pass legislation by three weeks from today in order to keep the government open, keep the government funded.

Jim DeMint and Heritage say the government should not be funded unless the president is also blocked from taking executive action. And they know what they`re doing here in terms of this as a tactic. The last time we got a government shutdown was this time last year. It was because of Jim DeMint and the Heritage Foundation. It`s because they -- they really made it happen.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: The Heritage Action to defund Obamacare town hall is in full swing. So far, it`s getting massive turnouts everywhere it pops up. The guy behind all this and the nationwide tour, the president of the Heritage Foundation, the former senator, Jim DeMint.

JIM DEMINT, HERITAGE FOUNDATION: So, Heritage Action, we`re going to be doing dozens of town halls around the country. And I`m convinced, the more Americans know about Obamacare, the more they`re going to stand with those of us who want to stop it.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MADDOW: Who want to stop it magically by shutting down the government.

You might remember this from the last shutdown. The Heritage Foundation even did stuff like basically movie trailers to try to build a national movement to support the shutdown effort.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DEMINT: But if Obama would not accept a funding bill for the government that fully funds the government because it didn`t have his failed law in it, then he would be shutting down the government. And that`s a case we`re going to take to the American people.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MADDOW: The fight against Obamacare. It`s not over.

You might remember during the 16-day shutdown, the last one we had, remember, they would hold these votes, these periodic votes about whether or they should reopen the government. Heritage Foundation was whipping those votes. Look, key vote, telling Republicans they`d be rated on their Heritage Foundation scorecard as to whether or not they defied Jim DeMint and the Heritage Foundation and voted to reopen the government.

Heritage Foundation was giving the Republicans orders -- vote no when you have a chance to reopen the government. And they kept the government shut for 15 days.

Most of the time, the Republicans did just vote no, sometimes instead, they would out of fear cancel the vote. Look at this. Quote, "FOX News is told that a decision by Heritage Action to come out against the emerging bill drove some Republicans to oppose the plan and help therefore helped sideline the proposal." Heritage said we shouldn`t do it so we stopped trying to do it.

We got a 16-day government shutdown last year because Jim DeMint and Heritage said they wanted it.

(BEGIN AUDIO CLIP)

SEN. JOHNNY ISAKSON (R), GEORGIA: Quite frankly, Heritage Action came out against any compromise and the Republicans could not come together.

(END AUDIO CLIP)

MADDOW: Heritage Foundation and Jim DeMint are the people who organized the last government shutdown. And Republican leadership said they didn`t want a shutdown then either. Right?

Back a year ago the Republican leadership was like, we don`t want a shutdown. Of course we`re not going to shut down the government. This is the last thing they want.

Same way they`re saying now, they don`t want another shutdown. But you know what? Last time around, these kooky guys on the ski lift made them do it. Won the fight. Got to metaphorically stay in the private ski club, the kooky guys did, not the establishment guys did.

And now, the Heritage Action folks, the Jim DeMint side of the fight, they are trying to make Republicans do it again. Even as Republicans say they don`t want to, they`re trying to force them to.

This is Heritage now telling Republicans that they should fight immigration reform the same way they fought Obamacare this time last year. Shut down the government. No blank check for amnesty. Don`t fund the government. Shut it down over President Obama`s immigration actions.

Republican leadership, John Boehner, Mitch McConnell, almost all the rest of the leadership, is out explicitly saying, we don`t want a shutdown -- just like they said this time last year. They had Hal Rogers, who`s the chair of the appropriations committee in the House, come forward and say, he thinks he has a plan. He`s come up with a way to defund just the parts of the government that specifically relate to what President Obama about to announce on immigration. You could keep just defund those small parts of the government but keep the rest of the government open and running.

Today, the Heritage Foundation laid down the marker on that and said, oh, no, Republicans, that`s not good enough. Nothing short of a full shutdown is good enough. They said this rescission policy that Hal Rogers has come up with, that, too, would be a blank check for amnesty.

So, this time last year, the Republican establishment fought the crazy shutdown people and the crazy shutdown people won and we got a government shutdown. That was over Obamacare.

Now, the fight is over immigration reform, but it is still the fight between the same Republican leadership and the same crazy shutdown people. And the crazy shutdown people this time on this issue are really crazy, I mean, to the point of publishing reports about immigration reform that come with their own pointy little white hat that has eye holes in it.

Jim DeMint and the shutdown chorus on the substance of this, on the policy on immigration, they are really, really, really out there, on the get deported from Budapest eugenicist fringe.

That alone should make them less powerful on this issue. And the Republican establishment is supposed to have more leverage now against this kinds of guys, since they have increased the size of their majorities in both the House and increase their numbers in the Senate, enough to take over.

But you know what? Every time recently when we have seen the kook fringe and the establishment fight each other on the right, every time we`ve seen Randy Scheunemann and the white supremacist guy fighting on the ski lift, it has been the kook guy who has won the fight.

Is the Republican establishment now stronger, so they`ll be able to stand up to these guys this time? Are we going to have a government shutdown from the Republicans in reaction to what Obama is going to announce tomorrow night, two weeks since the election, three weeks until a shutdown? Ultimately, who is going to call the shots here? Who is running this place?

Watch this space.

MADDOW: One the even of his big announcement about immigration reform tomorrow night, President Obama tonight invited 18 Democrats from Congress to come to the White House for dinner and for a conversation about that plan that he`s about to unveil.

Among the lawmakers there tonight was Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico. Congressman Lujan has just been named the new chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, DCCC, which means it will be his job over the next two years to oversee the effort by Democrats to win back control of the House.

Congressman Lujan joins us live from the White House, having stepped out from this meeting.

Congressman, thanks for braving the cold for us. I appreciate you being here.

REP. BEN RAY LUHAN (D), NEW MEXICO: Rachel, it`s a pleasure to be with you here. It`s not too cold out.

MADDOW: Oh, good. Actually, I was going to say, you don`t look -- you`re not chattering your teeth yet, so I don`t feel guilty yet.

So, what can you tell us? What can you -- what beans can you spill about what you`ve learned about the president`s announcement for tomorrow?

LUJAN: What we learned tonight is an important briefing about the actions that the president will be taking with comprehensive immigration reform -- you know, actions that were taken by presidents since Eisenhower, presidents like Ronald Reagan, George H.W. Bush who took action to keep families together. At the time, George H.W. Bush took action, it kept 40 percent of those who were undocumented together.

And what the president laid out was a very clear plan. It`s going to be bold, but it`s going to be tough. It`s accountability, paying taxes, background checks, getting line. You know, contrary to what Republicans are saying, I think Marco Rubio said it best when he said that the environment that we have today is de facto amnesty.

What the president is doing is not amnesty. It`s accountability.

MADDOW: In terms of what the White House and what you guys are expecting from the Republicans, does the White House and do you guys in Congress on the Democratic side have any expectation of what Republicans are going to try to do to stop this and what the sort of counterstrategy is going to be from the Democratic side?

LUJAN: Well, this is the first step. And the president`s taken an important step, but it`s the first step. I hope that House Republicans use the rest of this year to move comprehensive immigration reform because it`s House Republicans that have been stalling this bill for 510 days. Republicans have a chance to act. But sadly, we`re hearing more and more talk from Republicans about a government shutdown.

And I`m certainly hopeful they`re listening to the American people because the American people do not want the government shut down.

MADDOW: You have an important new job in Democratic politics. You`re going to be in charge of maximizing the number of House seats for Democrats in the next election. Thinking with that sort of electoral hat on, I have to ask you, if you think that it would have been a better political move for the White House to do this before this last election, anybody who might have been protected by the president not acting in a pro-immigrant way, it seems like they lost anyway.

Should this have happened earlier? Could it have been politically helpful for Democrats?

LUJAN: Well, you know, House Republicans would constantly say the president should or should not act. And they turned this into a political fight.

This is about keeping families together. I`m certainly hopeful that we can talk about that more going forward as opposed to what the political and the politics that Republicans were throwing at us on this.

Look, Rachel, it`s important that the president take this action but even more important that House Republicans move forward and get something passed. We have a few days left and we need to get it passed. But in the end, I think the American people are going to watch closely and they`re going to see who is for them and who is against them.

MADDOW: Congressman Ben Lujan of New Mexico, thanks very much for talking with us about this. And congratulations on your new gig, sir.

LUJAN: Thank you, Rachel. Look forward to talking to you again.

MADDOW: Indeed, thanks.

All right. Much more to come on this busy news night, including a best new thing in the world that people that work on this show have been begging for, for three years now. Three years they`ve been asking for this. They`re finally getting it. It`s a good one.

Please stay with us tonight.

MADDOW: This morning, the incoming class of House freshmen held their office space lottery. New members all lined up, they drew a number to assign first dibs on office space in the new Congress come January when they`ll all be sworn in. The lower the number, the better your pick of office space.

Now, there is a superstition apparently about this lottery. The superstition is that incoming members of Congress in the past who performed some kind of stunt before drawing their lottery number, thereby increased their luck. So, that`s the superstition. That`s the back story.

This morning congresswoman to be Gwen Graham`s name was called, then this happened.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Ready?

(CHEERS)

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Ms. Graham has drawn number six.

(CHEERS)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MADDOW: Brand-new Florida Democratic Congresswoman Gwen Graham`s staffer busts a full-on back flip, the stunt, and then she pulls a six, which is a really good number. So, she`ll get a really great office. And presumably, she`ll get bonus points of some kind for the staffer doing the back flip wearing slacks and dress shoes.

But I have to tell you, as awesome as that is, that is not the best new thing in the world today. We have something that nosed that out for best new thing. I swear, it`s even better.

Stay with us.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: I am a DREAMer and I live in fear that my mother will be deported. President Obama, will you include her in your administration relief? Will you include my mother?

BARACK OBAMA, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Hold on. Hold on. Hold on. Hold on.

You`re a DREAMer, and I gave you relief administratively and we`re going the work on the next one. The Republicans are blocking immigration reform.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

HAYES: That was taken two days before Election Day. It was shot by a group called United We Dream.

United We Dream is one of the more active voices on the immigration reform movement. And by active, I mean directly active.

For months, direct action immigration activists have been pushing hard for reform even after Republicans in the House dropped the ball on immigration reform as legislation earlier this year, even though President Obama has been their ally on the substantive need for immigration reform and House Republicans were the ones that blocked it, United We Dream and other activist groups made a decision to keep their pressure focused on President Obama.

Congressional Republicans never did act, but tomorrow night, the president will make his official announcement of his plan to reform the immigration system by executive action.

So, how does that feel to the folks who have been pushing President Obama on this for months and months and months now? He`s been saying he agrees but they`ve been pushing and pushing and pushing. Now, that it`s actually going to happen, how`s that feel to them?

Joining us now is Cristina Jimenez. She`s an immigration reform advocate. She`s co-founder of United We Dream.

Ms. Jimenez, thanks very much for being here.

CRISTINA JIMENEZ, UNITED WE DREAM: Thanks for having me.

MADDOW: I feel like saying congratulations on what`s about to happen, but I guess I should ask if you feel vindicated, if you feel like what the president`s about to do is in part a reaction to the pressure you guys put on him?

JIMENEZ: Definitely. I think for us, Rachel, this is the result of months and years of organizing, of advocating, of the courage of people who are undocumented, directly affected by immigration laws who have come out, shared their stories, like myself, like my parents and many who have organized across the country.

Really, the announcement that is planned for tomorrow is the result of all of that work for many years, not only of young people but all of our communities. So, it is a victory to see that all of our effort has led the president to take this decision. Certainly, not everything we had hoped for and we have advocated for but it`s something we`re proud of to see how undocumented communities have pushed for this happen.

MADDOW: In terms of that decision, obviously, it`s a statement in itself to have people who are legally vulnerable because they`re undocumented, because they have undocumented family members, to see people put themselves in a position of both naming themselves, coming out, putting themselves in a position where they could be arrested, that is a brave thing to do and it`s a statement in itself.

There`s also the strategic decision to go not just be on that comfort level, but to also really target President Obama who all the while said he agreed with you.

How -- how did you arrive at that decision and why did you know that would pay off? Why not spend all of this time -- I know you protested people like John Boehner, too. But why not put all your pressure on the Republicans?

JIMENEZ: Rachel, you know, actions are louder than words. And we have realized that this discussion and this debate about immigration has been a political football for both parties. And it`s not until today that we actually see some actual action behind the words.

And so, you know, we had been advocating for legislation to happen. Ultimately, we know that it is going to be a permanent legislation that allows our communities and people like me to become citizens, one day because we`re eager to be part of the fabric of society.

We`re already part of it. We want to contribute. And that`s been the goal. But it was very clear from Republicans that they were just not on board.

MADDOW: Yes.

JIMENEZ: They blocked immigration reform. The Senate passed a bipartisan bill last year, and, you know, Speaker Boehner and the rest of the GOP in the House did not move the bill.

So, for us, when we look at our work in 2013, we said we don`t see Republicans moving. We have to strategically visit shift our efforts and get the president to do what he has legal authority for.

MADDOW: That`s interesting.

So, you saw the Republicans as a brick wall that really wasn`t -- at least after the Senate, after the House Republicans decided they weren`t going to move, they were a brick wall that wasn`t worth pushing your heads on. Instead, push for where you might get a response.

JIMENEZ: Because we are having -- over 1,000 deportations happening every day. Under President Obama, more than 2 million people have been deported. That was the pain, that was the urgency of our community.

We could not wait to be a political football between the two parties. So, we decided to focus on the president. And we`ve now gotten him to the point that he`s going to make an announcement that will benefit families.

And, you know, Rachel, it would be a bittersweet moment for us, because there`s going to be many DREAMers, immigrant youth across the country, and families that will now benefit from the program.

MADDOW: Oh, it will certainly be a limited action. I mean, by necessity in some parts and also by choice. I mean, there will only be a solution when Congress can pass something.

And if Congress does pass something, literally legislation that passes through both houses and gets to a president`s desk to sign, I have a real feeling the reason that will happen is because of you guys. You guys are one of the most effective direct action groups I`ve ever seen in my lifetime.

So, congratulations on your work. I know you really wanted this.

JIMENEZ: Thank you so much, Rachel, and the work keeps going.

MADDOW: Yes, Cristina Jimenez is co-founder of United We Dream. We`ll be right back.

Stay with us.

MADDOW: So, the new NBC poll, the new NBC/"Wall Street Journal" poll that came out. If this poll were a medical test, the resulting diagnosis would be schizophrenia. I mean, no offense to schizophrenia.

Look at this. Do you favor the basic idea of reforming the immigration system? Do you favor a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants? The answer, yes, 57 percent of the country favors that.

OK. How about if we achieve that goal the way President Obama says he wants to? Do you favor a pathway for undocumented immigrants that also requires them to pay a fine and any back taxes and to pass a background check, like the president want? Do you want that?

The answer: yes, with an exclamation point -- 74 percent yes. We love that idea. As a nation, we love what the president wants to do to reform immigration policy. Great. That seems very simple.

Now that the president is going to act on immigration policy, let`s ask about that. Do you favor what the president is about to do? No.

No. We love this policy. We hate this policy. How dare this president does what we want?

Here`s my other favorite. They asked people what the newly elected Congress should do in Washington. What do you want them to do?

And this is the list of ranked policies -- policies ranked in terms of what people want the new Congress to do. Look at the top five. The top five most popular policies the American people want this Congress to pursue are: number one, lowering the cost of student loans, also increase spending on infrastructure, raising the federal minimum wage, approving more money to fight Ebola, and limiting carbon emissions to fight climate change.

Those are the five most popular policies on the whole list of things that Congress should do. The top five are all things that the Republicans who were just elected to lead the Congress are adamantly opposed to.

So, as a nation, we just elected a Congress that has pledged to fight tooth and nail against the policies that we most want to see enacted.

And here`s the best part. When asked are you happy with what you just did, are you happy with electing this new majority that`s pledging to stand against everything you want, does that seem like a good thing? The answer is yes. Yes, very happy with the result of the election.

So, Americans want very specific things for the country. And we`re also delighted to elect the people who will stop the country from getting those things.

It`s almost like people don`t really know what`s going on in politics. Or they don`t really know what decisions are being made and by whom in Washington. It`s almost like the public isn`t that well-informed about who wants what, what`s going on with policy and politics that even on issues that they say they care about. It`s almost like we don`t know.

In totally unrelated news, did you see that none of the broadcast networks are planning on carrying the president`s speech tomorrow night, on this big change on immigration policy? None of them. This thing that everybody has been freaking out about for the last two years, the biggest thing brewing in American politics for a mile, NBC is not going to carry the speech, CBS isn`t carrying it, ABC isn`t carrying it.

We`ll carry it. We`re going to have a special coverage of the president`s prime time address starting at 7:45 Eastern Time tomorrow night. I`ll be anchoring it with Chris Hayes and lots of other folks.

But if you didn`t want to watch us and you wanted to watch on the really low numbers on your cable box, they`ll be doing, you know, game shows and reality shows and stuff instead. No network coverage of the address tomorrow.

And that does happen. I mean, networks do occasionally give a president the one-finger salute. Less than three weeks before the midterms in 1982, the RNC tried to buy a big block of primetime national TV time for President Reagan to give a campaign speech. The networks in 1982 said no to that.

So, then the Reagan White House said, OK, the president won`t give a campaign speech. Instead he`ll give a nonpartisan address on the economy. NBC and CBS went ahead and aired that but ABC said no that year. ABC stations chose instead to run shows like "Entertainment Tonight" and "PM Magazine."

That wasn`t the only time that President Reagan got blanked on TV. One of the things, it`s interesting, when you read the Reagan diaries, one of the things that President Reagan said frustrated him, than anything else when he was president, was that he couldn`t get the public to agree with his position on Nicaragua. He really wanted to get involved in that civil war. He wanted to arm the rebels, trying to overthrow the government. And Congress said no to that. Ultimately he ended up doing it secretly and illegally and getting caught for it.

But he was frustrated about that. He knew he was a great communicator. He believed he could move the country to his way of thinking on almost anything but on this issue of Nicaragua, which was really important to him, no matter how much he talked about it, the country hated the idea.

Well, twice during his presidency in 1986 and again in 1988, the Reagan White House scheduled national primetime TV addresses for the president to talk about how much he wanted to arm the Contras in Nicaragua, both times the networks all refused to air that Reagan speech.

In 1987, President Reagan asked for time to give another primetime speech about his disastrous Supreme Court nomination of Robert Bork. The networks also said no to that speech.

Under Poppy Bush for the first time, the networks stopped carrying all presidential conferences as a matter of course. In 1992, when Poppy Bush was on his way to losing his re-election effort, the networks all said no for the first time ever to covering a presidential press conference because what President Bush was going to do was basically hold a campaign event and they felt they had no obligation to defer to him on that. Well, in that election, of course, Bill Clinton beat Poppy Bush to become president, but then once he was president, Bill Clinton paid the price for that precedent having been set that now sometimes networks wouldn`t cover presidential press conferences and appearances.

In 1993, and again in 1995, President Clinton wanted to do big, you know, saturation coverage televised presidential press conferences, one on his economic plan, one on the issue of welfare reform. Both times almost all the networks said no to carrying that.

For our current president, as recently as April, the networks said no to a White House request for air time so President Obama could talk about the success of sign-ups for Obamacare. Liberals lament that the success for Obamacare, 7 million people signing up for insurance in the first rollout of Obamacare, people lament that that go so much less coverage than the various troubles with the Web site and all the other glitches. Well, part of the reason why is that when President Obama wanted a big primetime platform to do a formal major address proclaiming the success of the new law, the networks all said no, and instead chose to air "NCIS" and "The Voice" and "Marvels: Agents of Shield."

Well, now tomorrow night again, the networks are saying that they have way more important things to do than show President Obama`s speech. Unlike some of those other times that I justice mentioned, President Obama is going to go ahead and give the speech in primetime anyway. It won`t be on the networks. But we`ll see it here when he does it.

We`ll be right back.

MADDOW: OK, best new thing in the world today starts with a prank. You probably heard about this week, there`s a small town in Germany which played a role in Nazi history that it`s still living down to this day, basically one of the top Nazis who served Hitler was once buried in this little town. Enough said about that.

But because of that history, neo-Nazis in Germany like to gather in this town to march in honor of the dead Nazi. And the town does not honor the dead Nazi. The town is not neo-Nazi. And, frankly, lots of regular people who live in that town are sick of the neo-Nazi showing up there to march every year.

So, you may have seen this, this week. This year, they transformed the march which is supposed to support the neo-Nazi cause into its opposite. As the neo-Nazis marched through the town, they started to see weird signs like this one who said if the furor only knew. They didn`t knew why, but along the road of the march, there were these messages painted on the ground in the intervals that said things like, "thank you for raising 5,000 euros."

And the Nazis did not know it before they showed up for this march, but as they marched, I think it started to dawn on them at some point, at least the brighter among them, that they had inadvertently been tricked to participating in a walk-a-thon, for every meter they walked along the march route, they were raising money for something.

The payoff came at the end when they learned that their march for the neo-Nazi cause, in honor of a dead Nazi, had actually been turned into a fundraiser for an anti-Nazi group, for a group that exists to persuade neo- Nazis to defect and escape from that life.

The neo-Nazi marchers had advertently been tricked into raising 10,000 euros, about 12,000 bucks, for a group called Exit Deutschland, which is a great prank and a very satisfying story and that`s why it got worldwide coverage this week.

But here`s the thing. This isn`t the first time that Exit Deutschland, this group that helps people stop being Nazis, it`s not the first time they have turned something pro-Nazi into its opposite.

Three years ago, when I had roughly the same haircut and definitely the same jacket, we first reported on another cool version of this same idea.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MADDOW: About 600 white supremacist skinheads turned up to Nazi rockout to bands like Radical and Burning Hate. The first 250 skinheads to show up to the racist concert got this free t-shirt. It says in German, hardcore rebels, national and free.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MADDOW: Is that ringing a bell? Free t-shirt with a neo-Nazi message handed out at a skinhead concert. The idea was you would take the t-shirt home, wear it around and hopefully you Nazi scumbag, you`d eventually wash that t-shirt and when you did wash that t-shirt, the pro-Nazi design would wash off to reveal a completely different message. And also contact information for how to get out of the neo-Nazi life.

So, this is what happens when you wash it. We actually got one of the shirts and it has been sitting around in our offices since 2011, just waiting for us to have an excuse for us to wash it and see if it works. And honestly, and three years is a long time to have a potentially inflammatory neo-Nazi propaganda sitting around in our cubicle farm for just anybody to find and deeply misunderstand.

So, today, we put our offensive t-shirt on producer Nick Tutz (ph), who is a very good sport and is in no way sympathetic to neo-Nazism. Then we had Nick take off the shirt and throw it in the wash to see what would happen.

For the record, we also do not ordinarily ask Nick to do our laundry. But as I said, he`s a very good sport. But the result is, it worked. The original message is gone. Now it says in German, what your shirt can do, you can do also. In other words, your shirt can change to stop being pro Nazi, and so can you. It says below it in small print, it says, you know, call this number basically to get help, tells the shirt owner where to go if they want help getting away from their neo-Nazi friends.

Exit Deutschland tells us since they started this t-shirt campaign three years ago, we broke that story three years ago, since them, they say the number of people who have contacted them to try to get out of the scene has tripled.

And now, this new march prank, the accidental walk-a-thon, which has become an international hit, as far as news stories go, this will bring them some more money and possibly more candidates for their services.

So, from pro-Nazi march to anti-Nazi walkathon and far hard core Nazi t-shirt, to helpful and unexpectedly practical help in stopping being a Nazi, it`s all very smart.

But you know what, it`s the fact that we finally washed the damn t- shirt and it doesn`t live on producer Tricia McKinney`s (ph) desk skiving everybody out anymore, that honestly is the best new thing in the world today. Our office now has 100 percent less of what appeared to be Nazi regalia. Yay! I`m sorry, it took us three years to get rid of that.

But that does it for us. We`ll see you again tomorrow.

Now, it`s time for "THE LAST WORD WITH LAWRENCE O`DONNELL".

House Leadership Ranks Remain Mostly Stagnant For Democrats

ANCHORS: Juana Summers

GUESTS: Nancy Pelosi, Marcia Fudge, Ben Ray Lujan, Eric Swallwell

LENGTH: 546 words

RENEE MONTAGNE: Also on the Hill yesterday, House Democrats re-elected their top leadership. Nancy Pelosi will continue as minority leader, but as NPR's Juana Summers reports from Capitol Hill, there are rumblings among Democrats that Pelosi is not doing enough to promote younger members.

JUANA SUMMERS: Seventy-four. That's the average age of the top three members of House Democratic leadership. We're talking about Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, Congressman Steny Hoyer and Congressman Jim Clyburn. Now, take the same three positions - just switch the party to Republican. The average drops by 20 years to 54. And it's not just the Democratic leaders who are older. It's the whole conference. By and large, House Republicans are younger than Democrats. And the Democratic leadership has barely changed in the last decade. When asked if it was time for a change, here's how Pelosi responded.

(SOUNDBITE OF ARCHIVED RECORDING)

NANCY PELOSI: What was the day that any of you said to Mitch McConnell when they lost the Senate three times in a row, aren't you getting a little old, Mitch? Shouldn't you step aside? Have you ever asked him that question?

JUANA SUMMERS: Questions about Pelosi's leadership continue on Capitol Hill. While Pelosi was a big fundraiser for her fellow Democrats, some have question Democrats' messaging in the run-up to the election. Congresswoman Marcia Fudge is the outgoing chair of the Congressional Black Caucus.

MARCIA FUDGE: Our caucus is very disenchanted and disappointed. I mean, why would we not be? We've lost three straight elections in large numbers. And so, obviously, you know, we're going to be upset. And for those people who say they're not, they're not being honest.

JUANA SUMMERS: Perhaps recognizing the growing pressure to present a more youthful face, Pelosi made an unexpected pick to join party leadership. That's Ben Ray Lujan, a 42-year-old Hispanic lawmaker from New Mexico. Here's how Pelosi described him.

(SOUNDBITE OF ARCHIVED RECORDING)

NANCY PELOSI: A dynamic and forward-looking leader with a fresh energy and ideas House Democrats need for victory in 2016.

JUANA SUMMERS: As head of the DCCC, Lujan's first job will be recruiting new Democratic candidates. I asked whether or not he worried about the party's talent pool and whether there were paths to leadership available for young up-and-comers. Here's what he had to say.

BEN RAY LUJAN: I think we have some incredible young members, young candidates and incredible energy with the youth all across the country. And I think that only leads to more opportunities. We need to make sure we're getting more young people that are eager to serve in public office.

JUANA SUMMERS: Congressman Eric Swallwell is 34 years old and represents California. Like many young Democrats, he pointed to Lujan as evidence the party isn't going gray.

ERIC SWALLWELL: I think he represents the next generation of leaders in the Congress, and so I think his ability to use that to go out and recruit candidates across the country is going to be of great value to our party.

JUANA SUMMERS: But for now, there's no change at the top. Come January, Pelosi will kick off her seventh term as Democratic leader - five of those in the minority. Juana Summers, NPR News, the Capitol.

Rep. Ben Ray Luján appointed head of DCCC; NM representative 2nd Latino in post

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C1

LENGTH: 476 words

WASHINGTON - Rep. Ben Ray Luján, a New Mexico Democrat, saw his national political profile elevated dramatically Monday when House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi made a surprise announcement naming him chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

In his new role, Luján will take control of the U.S. House Democrats' election strategy and become a key member of the House Democratic leadership structure. The announcement came as a shock on Capitol Hill, as several more senior members' names had been floated for the position. Luján will become just the second Latino to hold the post. Former Rep. Tony Coelho of California headed the committee in the 1980s.

"I am pleased to recommend to our colleagues Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico, a dynamic and forward-looking leader with a fresh energy and ideas that Democrats need for victory in 2016," Pelosi said at a Capitol Hill news conference. "He has bold vision and determined leadership to deliver wins in difficult districts. I am confident (Luján) will prove a tireless champion."

A beaming Luján - son of the late New Mexico House Speaker Ben Lujan - apologized for being tardy to the news conference, saying he couldn't get off the phone with his "mama," who was "joyous" about the news.

"It got a little emotional," Luján told the Journal afterward, saying his mother told him his late father would have been proud of him. "We shared some tears and shared some laughs."

While the DCCC chairmanship is a high-profile, plum assignment for Luján, he faces a steep climb heading into the 2016 political cycle. House Democrats were drubbed in elections this month and Republicans now control both chambers of Congress. Democrats would have to pick up about 30 seats to capture control of the House.

At the news conference, Luján said he was up to the challenge.

While Democrats were congratulating Luján, officials at the National Republican Congressional Committee appeared pleased with the selection, as well - but for different reasons. Ian Prior, spokesman for the NRCC, said Luján is among the most liberal members of the House and his politics will fall flat with many Americans.

Larry Sabato, chairman of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia and one of the nation's best handicappers of House and Senate races, said Luján - while a surprise pick - has some qualities that can be helpful to the Democrats. Sabato also said he has his work cut out for him.

"Luján is a Westerner, Hispanic, and young and energetic," Sabato said. "That last quality will be critical as he attempts to climb Mount Everest and somehow restore Democrats to the House majority."

Luján has proved a popular member of the Democratic House caucus and most recently served as vice chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. Lujan's Democratic congressional colleagues from New Mexico praised his appointment.

New DCCC Chairman Eyes Current Executive Director

BYLINE: By Emily Cahn and Emma Dumain

LENGTH: 360 words

Incoming Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Ben Ray Luján said Tuesday he hopes the current Executive Director, Kelly Ward, will stay on for the 2016 cycle.

House Democrats endured sweeping losses in 2014, but Ward earned top praise from Luján, who said she is respected by the caucus.

"I have tremendous respect for Kelly Ward," Luján told CQ Roll Call in a Tuesday interview. "It's been an honor working with her throughout the years, getting to know her, she reaches out to members, she respects members, and I think she's incredible. So someone like Kelly, if not Kelly herself is someone that I hope that we would serve."

Ward just finished her third cycle at the committee. She served as incumbent retention director toward the end of 2010. In 2012, she was promoted to political director. DCCC Chairman Steve Israel asked Ward to serve as executive director in 2014.

If Ward is offered and accepts the executive director role, she will again start the Hurculean task of winning the majority for House Democrats.

In 2014, Republicans netted at least 12 seats, with a few races still too close to call. That puts Democrats even further into the minority.

The 2016 cycle is slated to be a better political environment for Democrats. But with the large number losses, it will be difficult for Democrats to regain control of the chamber before the next redistricting round after 2020.

Ward was non-committal when asked whether she is open to another cycle as executive director.

"I'm honored by Chairman Luján's confidence and faith, especially because he will be such an impressive leader in his new role," Ward said in a statement via a DCCC spokeswoman.

CAMPAIGN 2016: To pick up seats, Dems put their faith in lawmakers from the Mountain West

SECTION: POLITICS Vol. 10 No. 9

LENGTH: 736 words

Jennifer Yachnin, E&E reporter

Democrats have slotted a pair of moderate lawmakers from the Mountain West to helm their 2016 congressional campaign committees, but there are likely no hidden messages -- like a new emphasis on energy development -- as the party consolidates power in the Mountain time zone.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) announced yesterday that she will choose Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-N.M.) to be the next chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, while Senate leaders last week selected Sen. Jon Tester (D-Mont.) to helm the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee last week.

But while both lawmakers are regarded as moderates on energy policies, those views are unlikely to be reflected in competitive races as Democrats attempt to claw back seats lost in the 2014 midterm cycle. In an interview with E&E Daily, Tester suggested that his own voting record is likely to have little impact as Democrats defend incumbents in 10 states and look to poach from the two dozen Republican seats in play this cycle. "I don't know that it matters a heck of a lot, to be honest with you," said Tester, who serves on the Appropriations and Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs panels. "There's no cookie-cutter approach around campaigns. Everybody has to be able to run their own in their own state and be able to listen to their people and move forward." Geoffrey Skelley, associate editor of Larry Sabato's Crystal Ball at the University of Virginia's Center for Politics, said that while Democrats will look to retain gains in Western states like Nevada, Colorado and New Mexico in the presidential contest next cycle, that doesn't mean issues like energy production will necessarily dominate in congressional contests elsewhere. "If anything, it probably just means that those issues will get more attention simply because these individuals are in charge," Skelley said. "It's kind of chicken-and-egg: They got picked, and maybe this will be an end result, that those issues will get more attention." Skelley said that Pelosi's selection of Luján -- a move that surprised political observers, as five other lawmakers had publicly vied for the post -- is more notable because it marks the first time a Latino lawmaker will head the campaign committee. Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) led the DSCC in the 2010 election cycle.

In a statement announcing her pick, Pelosi called Luján "a dynamic and forward-looking leader with the fresh energy and ideas House Democrats need for victory in 2016." Luján, a member of the Energy and Commerce Committee and former chairman of the New Mexico Public Regulation Commission, has proved himself a decent fundraiser, typically bringing in more than $1 million in each of his campaigns. It's noteworthy that neither Luján nor Tester hails from a state that's considered a fundraising powerhouse. At age 42, Luján is likely one of the youngest people ever to helm the DCCC. Then-Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) was 45 when he took over the committee at the start of the 2006 cycle. Luján is the son of the late New Mexico state House Speaker Ben Luján (D) -- and is a distant cousin to both Rep. Michelle Luján Grisham (D-N.M.) and former George H.W. Bush administration Interior Secretary Manuel Luján, who was a Republican member of Congress from Albuquerque.

But Scott Segal, a partner representing power companies, oil and gas, and manufacturing at the law firm Bracewell & Giuliani, suggested that Democrats are also trying to showcase their diversity in another way: by featuring more moderate lawmakers at the helm of both campaign committees. Luján will replace New York Rep. Steve Israel, while Tester will succeed Sen. Michael Bennet (D-Colo.). "Who is in charge of the campaign committees does not determine in any appreciable way the issue selection for the next congressional race," Segal said. "Those individuals were chosen to show the political diversity within the party, to put a more moderate, business-orientated face on the party's apparatus, particularly in light of the shellacking they took in the 2014 midterms." He added: "It seems clear to me that candidates that favor a more modest approach to the federal government were favored [in 2014], and I think you could say that the electorate that Mr.Luján serves and Mr. Tester serves are comfortable with a more modest federal government." Reporter Nick Juliano contributed.

House Dems again tap Nancy Pelosi as their leader

BYLINE: Catalina Camia, USA TODAY

Catalina Camia, USA TODAY

WASHINGTON -- Nancy Pelosi was elected Tuesday to a new term as House minority leader, despite election losses by Democrats.

Pelosi, the first female speaker of the House, was unopposed and elected by voice vote as Democrats chose their leadership team for the next Congress.

House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer of Maryland was also expected to win another term as the No. 2 Democratic leader.

The new Congress to take office in January will have at least 244 Republicans and 186 Democrats. There are five House races that are too close to call or going to runoffs in December. Even without those undecided seats, Republicans will have their largest House majority since 1949, according to House records.

Pelosi, first elected in 1987, was nominated by Rep. Eric Swalwell, a fellow California Democrat, who hailed her as someone who listens and "builds consensus among our members."

She moved Monday to diversify the Democratic leadership with her selection of Rep. Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico, 42, to be chairman of the party's campaign committee. Lujan will be the first Hispanic to lead the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

"We're going to see a lot more Democrats get elected in 2016, and those numbers are going to surprise you," he said.

Lujan takes the place of Rep. Steve Israel of New York, who is staying in leadership in the new position of chairman of policy and communications. Reps. Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut and Donna Edwards of Maryland will serve as co-chairs of the Steering and Policy Committee, which is charged with making committee assignments and helping to shape the Democrats' agenda.

Lujan Chosen as DCCC Chairman

BYLINE: Jack Fitzpatrick

LENGTH: 201 words

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-CA 12) selected Rep. Ben Ray Lujan (D-NM 03) to serve as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in a surprise pick. Lujan was not mentioned as a possibility as frequently as Reps. Jim Himes (D-CT 04), Joaquin Castro (D-TX 20), Jared Polis (D-CO 02), Donna Edwards (D-MD 04), and Lois Frankel (D-FL 22).

Pelosi called Lujan "a dynamic and forward looking leader with fresh energy and ideas." (National Journal)

ISRAEL: 'WE FUNDAMENTALLY MADE THE RIGHT DECISIONS.' Outgoing DCCC Chairman Steve Israel (D-NY 03) said he wasn't "going to sugarcoat the fact that we fell short," but that "when bombs were bursting in air, and we were in the trenches, we fundamentally made the right decisions, as tough as they were."

Israel said directly that former New York City Councilman Domenic Recchia (D-NY 11) was Democrats' only choice against Rep. Michael Grimm (R). "It's easy for people who have never recruited to criticize recruitment," he said. "In the case of Domenic Recchia, we began a very aggressive recruitment process. We talked to many people and every single one of them with the exception of Domenic Recchia chose not to run." (Washington Post)

Democrats Shake Lineup in House Political Team

BYLINE: By JONATHAN MARTIN

SECTION: Section A; Column 0; National Desk; Pg. 15

LENGTH: 426 words

WASHINGTON -- House Democrats, searching for a new generation of leaders and with an eye on the increasingly important Latino vote, have selected Representative Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico to lead the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

They also named Representative Steve Israel of New York, whom Mr. Luján succeeds, to a new leadership post dedicated to communicating the party's agenda in the House.

Mr. Luján, 42, who was first elected in 2008, comes from a politically prominent Democratic family in New Mexico. His father, Ben Luján, was once speaker of the State House and was a longtime political power broker.

The younger Luján has been active in the Congressional Hispanic Caucus and is well liked by Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, the minority leader, and other members of the party leadership, which also gave him a coveted seat on the House Committee on Energy and Commerce.

As chairman of policy and communications, Mr. Israel, who ran the House Democratic campaign arm this year, will work to develop a unifying and clear line of attack against the House Republican majority.

Mr. Israel's position will be similar to the post Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, holds for Senate Democrats as head of the caucus's Democratic Policy and Communications Committee.

The appointment of Mr. Israel is both an acknowledgment that congressional Democrats have been unable to effectively define Republicans and that Ms. Pelosi does not fault him for the party's net loss of 12 seats in the midterm elections this month.

Mr. Israel, 56, is one of a handful of House Democrats thought to have his eye on ascending in the leadership ranks. There has been private grumbling among young House Democrats about their leadership, with some in the caucus hoping for fresh blood.

But both Ms. Pelosi and Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the minority whip, have made clear their intent to continue serving in their posts, and no one has stepped forward to challenge them. Ms. Pelosi, particularly, is a fund-raising powerhouse for Democrats.

Her selection of Mr. Luján over other ambitious House Democrats, some with extensive fund-raising connections of their own, suggests she is keeping a firm grip on the caucus's political apparatus.

While House Republicans will hold 244 seats in the next Congress -- the most they have had since the end of World War II -- Democrats are hopeful that they can make gains in 2016, a presidential year when the composition of the electorate is likely to be more favorable for them.

Steve Israel gets new post; Leaves DCCC role to take new leadership job; Ben Ray Lujan, first Latino in post, replacement

BYLINE: BY TOM BRUNE tom.brune@newsday.com

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A39

LENGTH: 441 words

Rep. Steve Israel will take on a newly created post to direct House Democratic policy and communications in the next Congress, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said yesterday as she named the first Latino to head the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee to succeed him.

Israel, a Huntington Democrat, will get his wish to remain in the House Democratic leadership as he steps down after two elections and four years despite grumbling by some Democrats that their party failed to get its message across as it lost at least 15 seats in the mid-term elections earlier this month.

"In his new role as chair of something called Policy and Communications, Congressman Israel will be an invaluable asset to our caucus working closely with the Steering and Policy Committee to develop our caucus message, jump start the middle class, and to reignite the American dream," Pelosi said at a news conference.

Israel, who has chafed recently about the difficult DCCC job, said, "You have no idea how happy I am. This may be the happiest day of my life."

Israel in an interview said he will serve in a capacity similar to the role Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) plays for Senate Democrats as chairman of the Democratic Policy and Communications Committee.

Replacing Israel as DCCC chairman, Pelosi said, will be Rep. Ben Ray Lujan (D-N.M.), a four-term congressman who was vice chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, where he led its political action committee.

Pelosi called Lujan "a dynamic and forward looking leader with a fresh energy and ideas."

The appointments will not be effective until tomorrow, after the House Democrats vote on their leaders for the next Congress in a closed session in the morning. Pelosi and her lieutenants, Reps. Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and James Clyburn (D-S.C.), are unopposed and expected to win.

Still, some Democrats publicly complained about the Democratic leadership yesterday.

"We think clearly there was a lack of a coherent and compelling message," Rep. Marcia Fudge (D-Ohio), chairwoman of the Congressional Black Caucus, told Politico. "We believe that certainly our leadership worked hard, but there's obviously something lacking because we lost so many seats."

But Israel said he has no plans to change the Democrats' essential focus on the middle class and women.

"Our country is experiencing the deepest and the most acute anxiety for the middle class in history," Israel said at the news conference. "And this new position within the Democratic leadership will bring our messaging and our policies, particularly on middle-class anxieties, to a new and never before seen level for our caucus."

Pelosi picks Luján to head House Democrats' political wing

BYLINE: Steve Terrell, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: NATIONAL POLITICAL NEWS

LENGTH: 721 words

Nov. 18--House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi announced Monday that U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan of Santa Fe will chair the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the political wing of the House Democrats.

The committee is responsible for recruiting candidates, raising funds, handling public relations and helping with get-out-the-vote efforts.

Pelosi told The Washington Post that Lujan, 42, "is really a focused operational person. ... I'm choosing him because of his political astuteness, and he can manage all of this very well."

Lujan said in an interview Monday that he and Pelosi first talked about the position a week ago. Pelosi asked him to keep it quiet, he said. "My mom's the only person I spoke to about it," he said. At a news conference about the appointment on Monday, Lujan apologized for being late, saying, "I couldn't get Mom off the phone."

Pelosi long has had a good relationship with Lujan, who was just re-elected to his fourth term representing New Mexico's 3rd Congressional District. In 2011, Pelosi visited Santa Fe, where she praised the congressman and his father, former state House Speaker Ben Lujan at public events. Lujan, according to The Washington Post's U.S. Congress Votes Database, has voted with the House Democratic leadership 93 percent of the time.

The Post described Lujan's new position as "a plum assignment heading into a 2016 political cycle that is expected to be much more beneficial for Democrats." The Post described the New Mexico congressman as "a fresh and much younger face among top House Democrats."

The move also could be seen as a sign of the growing importance of Hispanics in national politics. Lujan will be the second Hispanic chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. The first was Anthony Coelho of California, who served three terms as chairman starting in the early 1980s.

But after the brutal shellacking House Democrats took in this year's election, some might not see the job of managing the caucus' political operation as enviable. Lujan will face the challenge of rebuilding the operation.

This year, the party lost at least a dozen House seats to Republicans in the midterm elections, leaving them with the lowest number of Democrats in the House since the 1940s. "It's true we have the biggest deficit of Democrats in some time," Lujan said. "But this is a great opportunity to make gains in 2016." He said he believes that with his "humble beginnings" he can resonate with voters across the country who feel left out by the Republican Congress.

Lujan had expressed interest in running for chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, of which he's currently vice chairman. But he said Monday, "I will no longer be pursuing that this year." He said he's backing Rep. Linda Sanchez of California for that job.

A liberal activist group called the Progressive Change Campaign Committee praised Pelosi's decision -- but mostly for not choosing another Congressman who was interested in the job, Rep. Jim Himes of Connecticut.

"We thank Leader Pelosi for not selecting Jim Himes to lead the DCCC -- thereby rejecting the Wall Street wing of the Democratic Party," the group's co-founder Adam Green said in a statement. "In order to win key House races, Democrats must run on big, bold, populist ideas like those championed by Elizabeth Warren. This means recruiting economic populist candidates -- especially in red and purple states -- and working with them to integrate a populist vision into their campaign messaging. The PCCC will be doing this, and we hope to partner with Rep. Ben Ray Lujan and others to achieve success in 2016."

Some of the Washington press corps expressed shock at Lujan's appointment. Lynn Sweet, Washington bureau chief of the Chicago Sun Times, said in a tweet that the "little-known" Lujan's appointment was "controversial."

Among those who had been mentioned for the job were better-known members of Congress, including Himes, Rep. Jared Polis of Colorado, Rep. Donna Edwards of Maryland and Rep. Joaquin Castro of Texas.

TRANSCRIPT OF PELOSI PRESS CONFERENCE TODAY NOV. 18, 2014

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 1400 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi:

Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi held a press conference today to announce her recommendations of Congressman Ben Ray Lujan (D-NM), Congressman Steve Israel (D-NY), Congresswoman Rosa DeLauro (D-CT) and Congresswoman Donna Edwards (D-MD) for House Democratic Leadership positions. Below is a transcript of Leader Pelosi's opening statement, as well as a question and answer session.

Leader Pelosi's Opening Remarks

"Good afternoon everyone. The Chairman of the Democratic Caucus has informed Members that tomorrow we will elect the Leadership team for the 114th Congress.

"Should I receive the honor of serving as the House Democratic Leader, I will be proud to recommend the Members gathered here for important positions of leadership in our Caucus in the new Congress. As the next Chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, I am pleased to recommend to our Caucus Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico. He is a dynamic and forward-looking leader with the fresh energy and ideas House Democrats need for victory in 2016. Congressman Lujan has the bold vision and determined leadership to deliver wins in difficult districts. I am confident that Congressman Lujan will prove a tireless champion for our Members and candidates across the country, and I'm absolutely delighted to recommend him to the Caucus.

"As Chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee for the past four years, Congressman Steve Israel has consistently proved the depth of his wisdom and the strength of his strategic vision in making our case to the American people. In his new role - and we thank him for his leadership over those four years - in his new role as Chair of something called Policy and Communications, Congressman Israel will be an invaluable asset to our Caucus, working closely with the Steering and Policy Committee to develop our Caucus message, jumpstart the middle class and to reignite the American dream. Thank you, Mr. Israel, for agreeing to serve.

"Congresswoman Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut - well her innovative and unrelenting leadership is essential to our Caucus. She is what I call the godmother behind the When Women Succeed, America Succeeds' agenda. Her work on behalf of students and working families is unparalleled. Congresswoman DeLauro is the lioness of our Caucus, and I look forward to continuing to work with her as the co-Chair of the Steering and Policy Committee.

"I have to say about Rosa: the 40-some Members that were here from the freshman class of last year - we had 51, I think it's now 45 - they have entrusted their hopes, dreams, aspirations and their career paths to Rosa. And she understands their aspirations, as well as even more senior Members. So she is an institution that everyone by popular demand insisted that she, again, serve in this role. It pleased all of us; but I'm glad it pleased Rosa to do that.

"Congresswoman Donna Edwards of Maryland has been an energetic and impassioned voice within our Caucus ever since she came to Congress. As Chair of the Democratic Women's Working Group, she has been a forceful champion of America's women - continuing the work that she began as co-founder and executive director of the National Network to End Domestic Violence. Congresswoman Edwards' deep grasp of policy and priorities of middle-class families will make her a great asset to our caucus in the role of Policy Co-Chair.

These Members are tested and tenacious Members of our Caucus. They have the energy and the vision to win progress for the American people. I'm excited to work with them in these important roles, and I'm very pleased and honored to yield to my nominee to be Chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico.

Q: I have a question for Congressman Lujan. Just managing expectations - Republicans have built their largest majority sine at least the Truman Administration, possibly even the Hoover Administration if they can pick up one seat from these outstanding races. Where do you manage expectations? And is it a realistic goal to try to take back the majority?

Rep. Lujan. As Steve pointed out - as Chairman Israel pointed out, so many of the American people didn't come out to vote this year. As we're celebrating and remembering the 50th year of the Voting Rights Act and we continue to see Republicans chip away at that. I think that it's important that we go talk to more and more people. And I think we can set those expectations high. Going into 2016, we're going to see more of the electorate involved, excited, ready to work, and get ready to get more people elected. And so I think that, again, working closely with Steve and the team, we'll see those numbers as they roll out. But you saw those very close elections this year where Republicans spent a record amount of money. I think we're going to see a lot more Democrats get elected in 2016, and those numbers are going to surprise you.

Q: To add to that point here. Very soon we're probably going to have an executive order from the President. And not all Latino voters see issues the same: some will see the things the way most Republicans appear to see this issue. How do you see that playing out in the near term? I know two years is a long way away, but how do you see that playing out in the Latino community as this fight will probably emerge in the next few days here as to what the positions are?

Rep. Lujan. Chad, Republicans have been solving comprehensive immigration reform for over two years now. They've had a chance to put a bill up to vote; Speaker Boehner has stalled that. If Republicans in the House and the Senate aren't happy with actions that the President will consider - and we'll see what those look like going forward - they're in charge. They can put a bill forward, and I certainly hope that we can come together and work that way. I don't believe this is going to poison the well. And I'm certainly hopeful that we'll see more of that.

Q: Leader, there was some criticism this week about the decision to not let Representative Duckworth vote via proxy. And a lot of that is being directed to you given your position on leaves for women who have children, Family and Medical Leave Act. Could you respond to some of that criticism?

Leader Pelosi. First of all, let me say, I was one of the ones who said to Congresswoman Duckworth: "Don't come back here. This is the most glorious experiences in your life, your center of the universe will change for you when you have this precious new baby."

The rules of the Caucus are the same as the rules of the House: no proxy voting. And it would require changing rules of the Caucus as opposed to different from the rules of the House. She understood that full well. The fact is is that it's really important to be here, to be in Caucus; it's more important to vote on the Floor. If I were to make a fight, I'd vote to have a proxy on the Floor than whatever is going on in the Caucus. But the fact is: we don't know what's going on in the lives of many people - I think one of our Members may be having an operation this week or that - you're going to establish a situation where we're going to determine who has a note from the doctor or not. It's really a place we shouldn't go down, but is not to be confused with not having family and medical leave. We wish her well; she's a heroine to our country; we're very excited about the baby. And in fact, knowing about the baby, I appointed Congresswoman Duckworth to the Benghazi committee. Only five appointments did I have. I wanted our strongest Members there. She informed me of her good news and I just said: "Just take it as it comes to the extent that you can serve, we want you to be there."

So I don't know why all this fuss was made about a vote in the Caucus. I think that if the House wants to change its rules about proxies in general that applies to the Floor and the Caucus, it's another thing. But we wish her well. She has all of our good wishes and prayers. And I had a very lovely conversation with her. But even again, knowing of her beautiful expectation very early on, I said: "We need our best thinking there. We need you on the Benghazi committee."

I just want to ask Ben Ray Lujan if he would speak to his mom.

[Congressman Lujan speaks in Spanish]

Leader Pelosi. Thank you all.

New Mexico: News Briefs: NMDOT releases holiday anti-DWI ad

LENGTH: 826 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

Chaves County has issued the following news release:

NMDOT releases holiday anti-DWI ad

ALBUQUERQUE (KRQE) - A powerful new anti-DWI ad is hitting the airwaves. The makers of the ad say unfortunately it's inspired by many true stories. Just a few years ago in Albuquerque, a 10-year-old boy called 911 after his dad Michael Vigil took him and a friend to Hooters and then allegedly got behind the wheel drunk.

They were able to call for help before they were hurt, but many times the children can't and end up hurt. The ad is part of the New Mexico Department of Transportation's Holiday Superblitz campaign so it will run through the holidays on TV and radio.
More victims suing archdiocese for sexual assault

SANTA FE (KRQE) - Five more victims are suing the archdiocese of Santa Fe, accusing priests of sexual abuse. More than two dozen victims have made similar claims in recent years. The latest lawsuit alleges three people suffered abuse in Las Vegas, New Mexico dating as far back as the 1970s. Another alleged victim says she was abused by a priest in Albuquerque.

Investigators issue warning of mail thefts

LA PLATE COUNTY, Colo. (KRQE) - There has been a rash of mail thefts in La Plata County Colorado. While investigators are following leads on multiples suspects they've issuing a warning to residents.

They suggest you don't put out-going mail in your mail-box but instead drop it in a secure U.S. Postal Service box. If you have no choice, put the mail out close to pick-up time and remove mail on a daily basis.

Innovate ABQ makes changes to board

ALBUQUERQUE (KRQE) - Last week, KRQE News 13 reported how the board, aimed at creating new businesses and jobs in Albuquerque, was criticized for not being diverse.

Innovate ABQ is a joint effort by UNM, the city and private businesses and is housed at the First Baptist Church on Broadway and Central. Critics are not sure the board, made up of all white men, knows what New Mexicans need.

KRQE News 13 learned the board is now expanding to 11 members and will include a spot for a member from Bernalillo County. It also added Patricia Vincent-Collawn from PNM.

Council votes in favor of new stadium

ALBUQUERQUE (KRQE) - Albuquerque will soon get a new sports stadium built with money that was set aside to lure Tesla to New Mexico.

Monday night, the council approved a plan to use $12 million in bond funds to build a baseball complex on the west side near Community Stadium. Another $13 million will go toward projects along Route 66 including some for a new bus rapid transit system. Also, $10 million will be used to lure other manufacturing companies to Albuquerque. The plan was a compromise between councilors and the mayor.

Evidence room technician could face more charges

FARMINGTON, N.M. (KRQE) - An evidence room technician accused of stealing pills and cash from the police department evidence room in Farmington pleaded not guilty to charges.

Right now, Ashley Goodvoyce is facing charges of embezzlement, tampering with public records, four counts of possession of a controlled substance and 36 counts of acquisition of a controlled substance by misrepresentation. But a San Juan County judge says more charges are coming.

He told the Daily Times that the initial charges were filed before the police department determined the total number of items stolen from the evidence room. Goodvoyce is accused of taking more than 600 pills and almost $6,000.

National parks may hike prices

CHACO CULTURE NATIONAL HISTORICAL PARK (KRQE) - National Park visitors may be paying more than double to visit some of them.

Chaco Culture National Historical Park wants to raise its price per vehicle from $8 to $20. The National Park Service says the profits would help maintain trails and renovate buildings. The price hike would be phased over a three-year period. Chaco Canyon is one of 100 national parks planning to increase fees.

Pelosi picks Lujan as campaign chairman

ALBUQUERQUE (KRQE) - U.S. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi has tapped a New Mexico congressman to be the head of the party's campaign committee.

Democrat Ben Ray Lujan was picked to take over for New York Rep. Steve Israel as chairman of the Democratic congressional campaign committee. Pelosi made the announcement through Twitter saying Lujan's vision and leadership would mean victory for Democrats in 2016.
'Maze Runner' sequel begins filming downtown

ALBUQUERQUE (KRQE) - Downtown Albuquerque took on a different look Monday with scorched cars and sand lining the streets. It was all for an upcoming movie being filmed.

It's the upcoming sequel to "The Maze Runner: Scorch Trials." Some of the filming is taking place in front of the federal building. Filming will primarily take place around the Albuquerque area and last through January. At least 250 New Mexico crew members, 18 actors, and 1,800 extras will be hired.

The average age of the Democratic House leadership is 64. It's 53 for Republicans.; Age ain't nothing but a number?

BYLINE: Aaron Blake

LENGTH: 424 words

In America, Republicans are increasingly the party of older Americans. But in Congress, that's still the Democrats.

Democrats just added the youngest member of leadership in Congress, with 42-year-old Rep. Ben Ray Lujan (D-N.M.) being tapped as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Despite this, they still have a far older leadership team than Republicans. By more than a decade, on average.

The average age of the top five House Democrats (including the party chairman as No. 5) is now 64.2 years old, down slightly from 65 last Congress, as compared to 53 for the top five House Republicans.

And Lujan and 56-year-old House Democratic Caucus Chairman Xavier Becerra (D-Calif.) bring that average age down quite a bit. Because aside from them, the top three House Democrats - Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.) - are three of the four oldest leaders in Congress.

Part of the reason Democratic leaders are older, though, is that their conference is older. A Wall Street Journal analysis in 2011 showed that House Democrats, on average, were more than five years older than House Republicans. (These are old numbers, so it's not apples-to-apples, but they are probably close to where things stand today, given that Democrats added some seats in the 2012 election and the GOP added some in 2014.)

Five years doesn't sound like a lot, but across hundreds of members of Congress, it's a significant difference. And it's a big reason that Democratic leaders are considerably older three years hence.

Below, we compared the average age of the top five leaders in each chamber for each party, and also showed the average age of their members (again, circa 2011, not today). You'll notice that Democrats have older memberships in both chambers, along with older leadership.

You'll also notice that House Democrats are significantly older than House Republicans, but they're about on-par with Senate members from both parties. The Senate does skew a little bit older historically, but the numbers suggest, as much as anything, that the House GOP caucus is considerably younger.

All of these things are cyclical, of course, and when Pelosi, Hoyer and Clyburn step down, they'll likely be replaced by much younger members such as Becerra or maybe Lujan, or 55-year-old Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.).

But for now, Pelosi seems to be content to stick around for a while. And given her fundraising prowess, it's hard to see Democrats supplanting her. Which suggests that the youth movement will remain in waiting.

Despite losses and grumblings among rank-and-file, Nancy Pelosi isn't going anywhere;
She stacks her team with fresh blood but makes clear she won't leave until Democrats win back House control.

BYLINE: Ed O'Keefe

LENGTH: 1042 words

After more than a decade in power, Nancy Pelosi sits atop a beleaguered House minority whose influence is so diminished that questions are being raised about a change in leadership.

But Democrats are expected to easily reelect Pelosi as their leader on Tuesday despite grumblings about stewardship of the caucus, and she quickly reasserted control on Monday, filling out her leadership team with a mix of old allies and fresh faces. thes

And she reminded everyone of how key she was to their recent success, and that she intended to stick around.

"I'm the one that brung everyone to the party by winning the House in the first place," she said in an interview.
